Mitchell-Kernan said although the UCLA administration had a commitment for a diverse curriculum in the '60s, it took a while for many to accept and understand the reasons for it.

"One has to plan in relation to local realities," Mitchell-Kernen said.

"This candidate is better than the two I have evaluated. She actually gets it," Student Trustee-elect Al Lizana said. "This is our big chance to do the right thing. I hope we don't blow it."

David Scott and Luis Proenzea, the other two finalists, visited the campus last week.

UMass to help clean, fix up Amherst

By VANESSA ADELMAN
Collegian Staff

As part of their efforts to bring the community together, the University of Massachusetts Community Service Council and the town of Amherst have organized the first large-scale community service project in the history of the University.

"Into Amherst" will begin on May 1 when 500 University students, faculty, staff and alumni will join local residents and town personnel in refurbishing schools, community agency sites, conservation trails, green spaces and other public sites around Amherst.

Joan Stoia, the director of the Community Service Program at the Mather Career Center, and Dave Schimmel, chair of the University Student Community Service Council, are organizing the project to bring together 16 campus groups actively engaged in public service.

"We have two tasks," Stoia said. "First to be a catalyst to bring community service organizations on campus together and, second, to be greater — to see UMass as a campus that serves."

According to Schimmel, on May 1 the project will focus on beautifying and cleaning up the center of town, but later efforts will continue all around the town.

"There are several benefits from the project," Stoia said. "First the town can always use students' help which will ease any tensions, because sometimes the town and University have been at odds."

Not a single student attends as housing conference flops

By TROY MERRICK
Collegian Staff

Last night's housing forum in the Hampshire Dining Commons was a major disappointment, said Housing officials after not a single student showed up to offer suggestions for change in housing policies.

"I'm disappointed we didn't have a turnout because I'm concerned to hear what people would have to say," said Mary Ellen Sailer, special assistant to the vice chancellor for Student Affairs. "I hope more people turn out at the next forums. We wouldn't want to perceive this as indicating there are no concerns among the students."

Another forum will be held tonight from 7-9 p.m. at the Worcester Dining Commons, with a final one to be held Thursday, April 1 in Campus Center 165 from 1 to 3 p.m.

Nine members of the 16-member House Services Review Committee were present, including Colleen Coleman, resident assistant; Sheila Mammen, associate professor and head of the Consumer Studies department; Jeanne Horrigan, associate director of the New Student's Program; and Karolyn McAuley, an undergraduate student.

The committee is made up of individuals recommended by students and campus staff on the basis of their hard work and their concern about students' housing.

"We're here to listen and learn more about what the issues and concerns are in the community," said Paul Vasconcellos, associate dean of students. "Our committee is designed to get firsthand knowledge about assessing how successful the matching of the students' needs with Housing's responses is."

Committee members stressed the necessity for students from all over campus to bring any comments about housing,

Students find methods to defend against hate

Saturday afternoon, concerned UMass students assembled to address issues of oppression and explore ways they could defend themselves and others against hate crimes.

Organized by Allied Students Against Prejudice, and co-sponsored by the Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay Alliance, the five-hour seminar was divided into three workshops, each addressing the various dimensions involved in confronting hate crimes.

"We live in a society and on a campus that is very prejudiced against all kinds of groups and it's important for those groups who want to fight against it to be able to come together and work on the issues that face the campus," said ASAP founder Carrie Walker.

Organized following last semester's racial assault on Arlens Barosy, a Haitian resident assistant, ASAP has taken the initiative in creating a student organization that deals with all issues of oppression.

ASAP created "Rainbow Patrols" to monitor the campus and watch for hate crimes. Members of the Patrol undergo assertiveness, defense and confrontational skills training to prepare them for any situation.

"While the administration hems and haws, and calls for another commission, we're doing something about it," ASAP member Greg Maney said.

"Our purpose is to serve as a deterrent to hate crime and in the event that we witness directly a hate crime, to intervene using the least amount of force necessary to defend the rights of the victim," Maney said.

As an ex-member of the Black Panther Party and a life-long community activist, Djata Bumpus has seen a lot of hate crime. Speaking to the group of approximately 15 people, Bumpus discussed the history of racism and racial terms, and counselled students on how to organize struggles against oppression.

Bumpus said he objected to the use of the term "White" as an all-encompassing definition of light-skinned people.

"I always stop people when they call themselves White because they're not. You may be European-American, but you're not White," Bumpus said.

Explaining the evolution of racial terms, Bumpus said, "It wasn't until way into this century that Irish and Polish people were checked off by the town clerk as White. They were checked off as a race other that White."

Bumpus warned against community safety groups becoming vigilante groups, and in the process, losing direction and effectiveness.

The second workshop was conducted by women from the Valley Womens' Martial Arts, providing assertiveness and self-defense training. Students who participated said they found the training helpful, relieving some of the discomfort and fear of being confrontational.

"I've always been, like, violence? No. But I guess there are some times that, realistically, you may have to use it," said ASAP member Scott Ambro.

The final workshop which addressed issues of violence against women was facilitated by Meeghan Ziolkowski from the Everywomen's Center and Ben Zeman from the Program for Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Concerns.

After offering statistics, and a general introductory explanation of the issues facing women, men and women were asked to reflect on the information and share their feelings and concerns.

Ambro told about a sexism workshop he attended at which only two out of 25 participants were men.

"Where are the men? It just gets so frustrating. I see [violence against women] every day," Ambro said.

Referring to the death of UMass student Tara Hartnett, one woman said, "I think it's sad that people are not more aware of it until something as traumatic as a death happens."

Couples promote tolerance with touch

By ALYSSA M. OWENS

SETH KAYE / COLLEGIAN
Two women kiss during yesterday's Public Display of Affection rally to kick off Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay Awareness Week.

Gay, lesbian and bisexual couples kissed, hugged and held hands in full view of the public yesterday in the Student Union.

The "Public Display of Affection" kicked off Gay/Lesbian/Bisexual Awareness week, which began yesterday. Organizers said they hoped the event would promote tolerance among heterosexuals who believe affection between same sex partners is unnatural or disgusting.

About a dozen people participated in the event, which drew a crowd of 40 to 50 observers.

"I think it's good," said Michael Lodge, a freshman wood technology major, who was observing the event. "A lot of people need to be cultured about this. The culture is out there but people don't react to it calmly."

"Hey hey, ho ho, homophobia's got to go!" and other chants accompanied the event, which lasted approximately 15 minutes.

"I'm glad they're coming out," said Christine Lellos, a sophomore psychology major. "I think that's the only way we're going to accept them into society."

"I don't think they accomplished what they wanted. It's more of a circus," said Brad Gelling, a sophomore geology major, who said he believed the event's real goal was to portray gay, lesbian and bisexual culture as a natural part of society.

"I don't mind [the event], though. I think it's great," Gelling said.

Wendy Mataya, media coordinator for the Program for GLB Concerns, who participated in the display, expressed satisfaction with the event.

"I think it went fabulously. We had a good turnout," Mataya said.

"We got a lot of support for our actions as well as for our rights," Mataya said.

The event was followed by an Awareness Week Kickoff Rally in the Cape Cod Lounge, with Pat Griffin, an associate professor in the School of Education, speaking.

"I think it's exciting to kick off GLB Awareness Week because there are so many interesting things to do," said Griffin, who chairs the Chancellor's Task Force for Gay/Lesbian/Bisexual Matters.

Griffin urged students to write letters to the president, asking that the military ban on gays be lifted and to their high schools, asking that support for gay, lesbian and bisexual issues be given at that level.

She also encouraged students to attend the GLB March in Washington, which will be held April 25.

Griffin said now is a time for hope and patience, regarding GLB issues — hope because of what has already been accomplished and patience for all the progress that is yet to be made.

Activists call for end to conflict

Prof. says individual action a key in Balkan fighting

By BRIAN C. O'NEILL
Collegian Correspondent

The road to ending conflict in the Balkans involves individuals taking responsibility for finding peace, said two peace activists Saturday at Smith College.

Theodore Herman and Jasminka Udovicki gave a lecture titled, "The Way not taken. . . non-violent alternatives in the Balkans," where they presented a peace plan and recounted some personal experiences about the war.

Herman, the director emeritus of Peace Studies at Colgate University, gave a detailed account of his plan. Udovicki, a Serbian who has lived in the United States for the past 15 years, told about her recent trip back to Serbia to support the peace movement there.

Both speakers stressed the role of the individual in putting an end to the crisis.

"The individual that cares must say 'the responsibility begins with me,'" Herman said.

Herman's eight-step program focuses on the role of the media in ending the crisis. "To reach the whole country is not difficult," he said. "Yugoslavia is only about the size of Virginia."

The plan calls for the media to plead with Yugoslavians to stop the war. Another idea Herman had was to give cash rewards for the delivery of live war criminals.

Another step in the plan is to have war criminals tried in their home districts. Herman said doing this "avoids foreign powers deciding on punishments. For every case there should be a combination of justice for the victim and concern for the more peaceful community to be built."

Editor discusses gay strategies

By ANDREW LUMB
Collegian Staff

Fresh from the frontlines of the gay movement, an editor of an activist magazine discussed the gay agenda and the strategies that they must use to enact it.

Anne d'Adesky, editor of Out magazine, led a Brown Bag lunch sponsored by the Program for GLB Concerns on campus Friday to follow up a larger presentation Thursday, which included political analyst Chip Berlet.

The real problem for the gay movement, d'Adesky said, was getting attention. She said the thousands of people who marched on Washington D.C. in 1987, when the AIDS quilt was made, and the outrage over artist Robert Mapplethorpe's work, "forced the issue," into the public consciousness.

AIDS and other health issues have brought the gay movement into the spotlight, but they have also prompted a search within the gay community for an identity, both individually and as part of a group, d'Adesky explained.

The gay agenda, according to d'Adesky, focuses primarily on AIDS, gays in the military and convincing school board members to implement diverse teaching.

Homocentrism, as she called it, is the degree to which homosexuals "come out" and join the fight.

She said the two most common responses to gay-bashing are either to go "more into the closet" or seek federal protection, which was the purpose of the Washington march.

Pete Williams, the Pentagon spokesperson during the Gulf War, was "outed," meaning radical gay activists, under criticism within the gay community, made his sexuality public although he had tried very hard to keep it a secret, according to d'Adesky.

D'Adesky mentioned topic polling, which is used to measure the average American's support of gay issues and expose false claims by opposition groups. He said it was revealed that the Vatican has admitted for several years that homosexuality is a birth trait and as unchangeable as eye color.

Student gov't seeks to fill advocacy slot

By KENDRA WILLETT
Collegian Staff

Candidates for the directorship of the Student Center for Education Research program will address students, staff and faculty within the next two weeks.

According to Jennifer Wood, student government president and the primary force behind the program's return, the student advocacy center first operated in the early '80s.

Composed of a staff working on issues that concerned students in particular, SCERA researched issues such as tuition, higher education problems and anything else that seemed of importance to students.

As SCERA became a larger organization, the administration found its power overwhelming, and encouraged its termination, Wood said.

The Undergraduate Student Senate voted to eliminate the SCERA program in 1987, Wood said.

Now, six years later, the Student Senate has passed a new charter for SCERA and the search for a director is the first concern. Wood said she hopes the new director will begin in May.

Financial aid, tuition and state funding are issues that the program already plans to address as soon as it is in effect.

"Another issue of concern that the new director will be faced with is coming up with ways of getting opinions on issues from the students," Wood said, something which has traditionally been a problem for the SCERA staff.

Cape Verdean students urged to benefit society

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

Dr. Bruce Rose Saturday urged Cape Verdean students to use their education to benefit society.

Rose, the dean of Student Affairs at Hudson County Community College in New Jersey, said Cape Verdeans students should feel fortunate they have the benefit of a college education.

"Those of you here have overcome one of the most formidable challenges for people of color," Rose said. "That is to go through high school and to make it to college."

Rose said the percentage of Blacks entering college lags far behind that of Whites. He said as the year 2000 approaches, more and more jobs will require a college education.

He said the economic strength of the Black community depends on Black students receiving the education they need to compete in the workforce.

Rose said Cape Verdeans, and Blacks in general, who manage to get an education are morally bound to take responsibility for the welfare of the less fortunate.

"You are a truly privileged group of people because you have the advantage of an education," Rose told the Cape Verdean students present. "But with that privilege comes responsibility to use your education for the good of society."

"The vitality of the next generation rests squarely on the shoulders of the present generation," Rose said.

Rose said when Blacks strive to reach their full potential, it benefits society in general. He also defined what he meant by being socially responsible.

"You have responsibility, not just to yourself, but as a human," he said. "Give of yourself and contribute to the well being of the community. I define taking responsibility as acting selflessly to benefit the interests of the community in which you exist."

Rose said helping the poor, the homeless, getting involved in environmental protection and promoting racial equality are all examples of how we can be socially responsible.

"Stop and consider the consequences of your actions or inactions," said Rose. "Whatever benefits or privileges you enjoy now you have because someone before you acted with responsibility.

"We are morally bound to give more than those who gave before us," Rose said. "That way you can increase the opportunities of those around and the opportunities of those who will follow you."

Rose was one of the several speakers who came to talk at the Cape Verdean Awareness Day. Other events included a slide show, a dance performance by the Cape Verdean group "Nzinga," and a Cape Verdean dinner and dance at the Blue Wall Cafe.

of Art, told the story of a Croatian soldier she met who was being treated at a Boston hospital. Udovicki said she felt the need to tell the soldier she was Serbian. The Croatian replied, "It doesn't matter what you are."

"This moved me," Udovicki said. "It made me realize these people are not Muslims, Croats or Serbs, they are just individuals."

The Croatian told how he was immobilized in the first few weeks of fighting. Udovicki said to the soldier, "I left for the hospital with nothing, leaving behind my wife, child and father."

"I went back the first time and found my wife and child missing. . . The second time I went home I found out that the Serbs had killed my father," Udovicki said the soldier told her.

Udovicki said there are victims on all sides of the war. "Numerically the Serbs, Croats, and Muslims can be compared. But if you lost a son, or a mother, you lost what was dear to you no matter who you are."

Udovicki said, "Serbs feel the world can no longer see them as people, but only as Draculas."

Herman finished by saying, "It's time to say human rights are universal, let's begin in the Balkans!"

"Community service also will be a good part of the University experience," Stoia said. "Lastly it is always a better alternative than a jail sentence."

Two hundred fifty people have already signed up to participate, said Schimmel. He said the target is 300 to 500 volunteers.

In case of bad weather on May 1, Shimmel said there are plans not only for outdoor projects, but also for indoor projects, and that all work well with approximately 10 to 15 people which will include students, staff and faculty working side by side.

According to Amherst Town Manager Barry Del Castilho, the project will not cut into the jobs of public works employees. Most of the projects for the volunteers are things the town would not get around to because of cutbacks, Del Castilho said.

Organizers said the project has had support from many areas of the University and the town.

"The concept of volunteerism is very important and it rounds out the college experience," Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Thomas Robinson said. "It's a happy integration of events and people so when students leave the University and go into their communities they have this behind them."

was the issue of co-ed bathrooms in the residence halls. Although the general consensus of students is for co-ed bathrooms, Wood said she feels it is important to know the opinion of each individual student.

According to Wood, there are 11 intern positions and one teaching assistant slot vacant in the center.

Qualifications for the new director include either a bachelor's degree with four years experience working with students, or a master's degree and two years of experience.

"Knowledge of public education issues are very important for this position," Wood said, "And it is definitely a plus if the individual has teaching and training experience."

Tara Hartnett's death brought us all a little closer to reality

Last weekend, while you and I were finishing our spring breaks, a tragedy occurred. A young woman, Tara Hartnett, died after her former boyfriend allegedly stabbed her and set her house on fire because they were in the midst of a custody battle for their 11-month-old daughter. Hartnett's death hits closer to home than any of us want to acknowledge.

We are surrounded by this aura of what I call "it can't (and won't) happen to me" syndrome. We extend that to believe that nothing bad will ever happen to our family and friends and allow ourselves to be enveloped in a false sense of security. Tara Hartnett's death brought us all a little closer to reality.

Domestic and other violence in our society is all too commonplace. We accept tragedy daily, and allow it to filter in and become a norm in our lives. Violence has become an accepted way of life — this is evident any time we pick up a newspaper or turn on the television. Yet it is this tragedy that made us stop and think.

Tara Hartnett died unnecessarily. She has been described as a warm and vivacious young woman who had a zest for life and a passion for people. She was a good student and a caring person. She was a loving mother and a terrific friend. And until last Saturday, she lived a quiet life in Sunderland, going to school and enjoying life — much like you and I still do. Yet she died a tragic death that fills us with a void and a question of why.

Tara Hartnett's story is the epitome of a classic domestic violence dispute. She had already had numerous incidents with this man before — she had a restraining order against him, and she had filed assault and battery charges. Apparently this wasn't enough. Tara Hartnett died because she trusted a system that was supposed to protect her. She died because this system failed, again.

Stephanie EISENBERG

In our school and in our society, we are governed by a system that refuses to acknowledge and address the growing severity of violence in our culture. The system is still too wrapped up in the old-fashioned ideal that what happens between a man and woman is private and therefore does not belong in the public sector of our life.

This system is wrong, and it needs to be changed. We are continually asked to trust our government and its systems. We are told the system is there for our protection, and use, yet when we need it the most, it's not there. Not only was Tara Hartnett's death a tragedy, it was a preventable tragedy. And perhaps now we know that, maybe even the system knows that, but a very special young woman is still dead.

Although the killing of Tara Hartnett is irrevocable, we do not have to let her death be in vain. Let us learn from this tragedy so we can prevent similar ones from occurring. Let her death reiterate to us the dangers in this world, and show us once again that by working together as a community and a society we can prevent them. Let her death give us the strength to come together in unity to combat such tragedy. Let her death be a constant reminder that we are not safe, no matter where we are.

Regardless of what Tara Hartnett's death means to us, there are certain facts which still don't change. Tara's family will always be devastated by this tragedy; I cannot begin to fathom their sense of loss. Tara's friends have lost a wonderful friend and a fantastic person. And Tara's 11-month-old daughter, Meghan, will grow up with out her mother. The depth of this senseless tragedy is staggering.

Her death was a harsh awakening. We were jolted out of our peaceful reveries and thrown in the midst of tragedy. If anything, let this be a lesson on what we must do to prevent such horrific happenings in the future. Tara Hartnett is dead, but we don't have to let her death be in vain.

To Tara's family and friends, I offer my condolences and my deepest sympathies. Peace.

Comic strip is racially insensitive

I am writing to bring attention to the "Adventures of Fred" comic (Collegian, March 26). I found the comic strip to be very offensive. I hesitated to write this because I often find myself playing "devil's advocate," thinking that maybe I personally misunderstood Chris Shadoian's intention. After doing rather extensive surveying of other students' and faculty's views (both Black and White), I found I wasn't the only person who found this offensive — therefore, I found it necessary to let our collaborated views be heard.

My reasoning behind pointing out this comic is not to stir up the community, start a riot or degrade the character of the Collegian or its staff in any way (but if I do, well. . .). My objective is to point out just one more example of the offensive/racist views I find throughout the Collegian from time to time (weekly). This is not the first time something like this has happened and probably won't be the last. Many of the people I brought this comic strip to said, "This is ridiculous; he should be fired."

My response was, "Well, we've tried that before and unfortunately it doesn't do any good. Insensitivity must be in the job description. These people just seem to keep appearing. Students on this campus, since I've been here have columnists and cartoonists removed because their work was offensive to members of our student body. Just last year students tried to shut the Collegian down, to no avail."

What do we, as concerned students of this "multicultural euphoria" we call UMass, have to do to stop these things from happening? Since this was previewed before being put into the paper, I feel the entire Collegian staff should be held accountable. I expect a formal apology by the Collegian staff in the Collegian addressed to those of us who found this racially insensitive. I would expect this from the Minuteman, but I will not tolerate this from the Collegian.

What could be the next target?

"We will get out of Tel-Aviv," said Israeli labor party leader Yitzhak Rabin as he campaigned for leadership of his country. He was responding to a wave of terror attacks that struck the Israeli public from the turbulent Gaza strip.

Gaza is not only in Tel-Aviv but in New York as well. Or was it bound to happen? A friend of mine said the media "has been waiting for this moment for years." Terror hits home. The bombing of the World Trade Center sent a chilling fear down my spine. It had happened. A militant Islamic terrorist organization had dared to strike at the very heart of America. Never before had there been a major terrorist attack on American soil. Terrorism was considered a Middle Eastern or European problem.

After fear came anger. I have always believed terrorism is the dirtiest kind of war, and that those who use or support terror must be punished. But would we strike back? How? Against whom? Failure to do so would open the door to more attacks. Contrary to popular belief, terrorists strike hardest when their enemy is most willing to compromise and excuse their actions.

Is it any coincidence that the election of the most dovish government in Israeli history was greeted with an escalation of the so-called "Intifada?" What would be the next target? The Empire State building, the Lincoln Memorial? A small town synagogue would do.

The FBI and the New York Police Department are to be commended for their speedy, decisive arrests in the bombing case. What cannot be overlooked is that the federal government had information that could have prevented this atrocity. The FBI now concedes there is a vast, underground, armed and dangerous Islamic fundamentalist group operating in America. Their spiritual leader, Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman, is suspected of involvement in at least three murders in this country, including that of rabbi Meir Kahane.

What the FBI does not concede is that the Israelis had warned Washington about the possibility of terrorist group in America. Washington not only turned a blind eye to the information, but even accused Jerusalem of trying to divert attention from the crisis of the Islamic fundamentalist deportees in Lebanon!

As proven by the Trade Center blast, Islamic terrorism neither respects nor knows any boundaries. No other group has dared to attack America. In 1981, Israel warned the world of the danger of a nuclear-armed Iraq. The world not only failed to act, but condemned the accusation. Not until the Persian Gulf War was Jerusalem vindicated. Let's pray it doesn't take a decade to acknowledge the threat this time.

This 'girl' has something to say

I have one question for Christopher M. Miles (Collegian, March 26). What was your purpose? If you meant to offend practically every reader of the female gender, not to mention a large number of men who sympathize with the women's movement, you did.

You claim that "girls" miss the point because they thank Gloria Steinem for giving them self-esteem, and self-esteem must come from within. Women do not thank her for giving them self-esteem; they thank her for demonstrating the strength needed to establish self-esteem on one's own. In this society, young girls are still taught through the cultivation of media images, adult role models and the educational system to be passive, obedient and sympathetic to others while boys are encouraged to be assertive, domineering and self-absorbed. Women must learn to establish a strong inner sense of self-worth, and role models such as Gloria Steinem are a vital source of inspiration.

"Women want to be taken seriously, but they give men no reason to take them seriously." You want me to take you seriously, but the only reason I take you seriously is because your ideas scare me and should not remain uncontested. You claim rape is a "valid social problem," and men "are not doing enough time for it," but instead of writing to politicians and lobbying for stricter sentences (which we do), we "sit around and whine." We do not sit around and whine. We sit around and comfort rape victims. We sit around and discuss how to educate people so rape does not occur. We wouldn't have to worry about men "not doing enough time for it" if it did not happen in the first place. By the way, Chris, date rape is real; so please do not deny it just because you have not been the victim of such an act of aggression.

The women's movement does have something useful to offer society. Attitudes held by people like you (Notice I do not say all men, nor do I exclude women. This would be a generalization, and generalizations are something we should try to avoid) are precisely what we need to change.

Chris, this "whiny, pathetic little girl" has one final suggestion. The next time you feel you must strike out against a group of people you really do not understand, stop and think. Perhaps the one who needs to "get in touch with reality" is you. Those who are hostile toward others tend to be insecure about themselves. Maybe you are lacking self-esteem which could stem from inadequate social skills with women, especially if you treat them the way you write about them on paper.

To you, from us

You're sitting in the Blue Wall. You just spilled some coffee on the person next to you. You don't have any napkins, so you grab the nearest recyclable substance and mop up your mess. Then something on the newspaper you're holding catches your eye.

You stop. You think. Your hands start twitching.

Find a pen. Record your thoughts for posterity.

Cartoonist meant no harm

It is amazingly rare, with any form of writing, to be clear enough not to offend anyone. It is even rarer, I think, to not offend anyone when the writing comes in a humorous, visual form.

As it does in a comic strip.

When I was first told that people have been taking offense at "The Adventures of Fred" comic strip that ran in the paper Friday, March 26, I was surprised.

Chris SHADOIAN

"People are seeing it as a race thing?" I said.

They are. For a brief minute, I couldn't believe it. But then I remembered where I was. UMass — where race is always an issue, especially with the Collegian.

The tendency, it would seem, is to assume that if anyone writes something that could possibly be viewed as racist, it automatically is.

I assumed, when I wrote and submitted my comic, that people are open-minded enough to look at a picture of a black man and not think he is supposed to be Black.

My assumption was wrong. I won't make that mistake again.

I am not going to try to explain myself beyond saying that the joke in Friday's "Fred" was merely meant to be a visual, verbal pun. Nothing more. There are no underlying, subtle themes hidden in the content of the strip. Joe, the main character, is only supposed to appear as a photographic negative of his usual self.

The joke is by no means intended as a comment or slur on Black people. It is not supposed to mean that I think Black people are negative and therefore evil. Nor is the other character's comment, "Nothing a little 'white-out' can't fix!" supposed to mean that I think Black people can only be good if they become white. In the strip, Joe is supposed to be black only in color, not in race.

It is probably true that I could have delivered the joke differently without offending people. I have already thought of several ways I could have done this, and I will keep them — and this whole incident — in mind for future reference.

I am sorry if I offended anyone. It was certainly not my intent to do so. Please remember something: all of my Collegian co-workers and myself are students . . . and we are still learning.

Puerto Rican heritage deserves respect, honor

It has been quite an experience to listen to some opinionated individuals express their views on the political and economical situation of my country. The usual question — where are you from? — and my answer, Puerto Rico — is followed by a tirade of negative remarks about the living conditions in Puerto Rico and what should be done to improve those conditions. I hear these remarks from not only Americans, but also foreigners, and to my surprise, some Latin Americans as well.

Puerto Rican history cannot be compared to any other national history. It has been studied and understood. It should be approached with intellectual curiosity and respect. It is sad to confront those same individuals who contribute their negative remarks, by basing their knowledge on Puerto Rico's geographic position or the island's relationship with the United States. Their ignorance is appalling. Then, how can opinions of any kind be expressed, be they political or economical, when they stem from ignorance?

Jorge
MATOS

Thank God there is another breed of students and intellectuals. The serious students, who are willing to learn, cherish the art of exchanging knowledge and information through the practice of respect and dignity. The basic knowledge I want to share with them is that Puerto Rico was inhabited by the Taino Indians before the arrival of the Spanish. We have been a colony for 500 years. American citizenship was imposed in order to recruit Puerto Ricans for the Armed Forces in 1917. During World War I, Puerto Ricans were systematically brought to the U.S., especially to the East, as sources of cheap labor during a span of 30 years.

When industry started to move South, leaving many Puerto Ricans, as well as Americans, unemployed, welfare and government entitlements stepped in saving cities and states from economic bankruptcy.

Racism and discrimination are among the different factors that work against Puerto Ricans. Other factors include a colonial mentality and conditions that have devastated our nation. This point should be addressed as often as our impoverished condition.

The situation on the island is no different. The U.S. presence has been a determinant in our national development. If the island is among the poorest regions under the United States, Puerto Ricans are not to carry the burden of the responsibility. We are not owners of our national destiny, Congress is. We are paid less than American workers for performing the same tasks. We are forced to buy and sell our products in one of the world's most expensive markets — the U.S. The cost of living in Puerto Rico is as high as in New York City or Los Angeles.

Puerto Ricans vote in "democratic elections" every four years. But remember that Congress has the last word concerning everything that happens in the island. Pro-independence advocates have been continuously persecuted under the U.S. flag as they were under the Spanish flag. They have been jailed. Blacklists still exist in Washington containing hundreds of thousands of personal folders belonging to hundreds of thousands of "interdependistas." Even pro-statehooders are afraid that if the island becomes a state, Puerto Rican culture will be reduced to a local folklore or flavor, as it happens with Hawaii, Alaska, Louisiana and many other states, where the transculturization process resulted in the confinement of the natives to sections of the state, often called reservations.

The grandsons of Mexicans that have refused to leave their invaded territories in the 1840s and became American citizens are still called Mexican-Americans today. Like African-Americans, they hold the same second class citizenship that Puerto Ricans and Asian-Americans hold. Except for the inhabitants from the U.S. "territorial possessions", those minority groups live in states, vote in presidential elections and pay federal taxes. Why haven't these groups attained first class citizenship? Why are they still addressed as Mexican-Americans?

I have never heard of an American whose ancestors came from Scotland or Poland referred to Polish American or Scottish-American. These people were integrated into the mainstream of a society that they helped create.

The development of Puerto Rican history is different from that of other Latin American nations. We did not migrate to the United States looking for an improvement of our economic condition, as is the case of the ancestors of most of the U.S. population and of the Latin Americas that now migrate to this nation. The United States invaded and colonized Puerto Rico, the same way England colonized the American colonies in the 17th and 18th centuries. Puerto Rican resistance has been, but not confined to, cultural as well as political. We have exposed the island's situation internationally.

The involvement and alignment of the Latin American, Asian, African and Middle Eastern nations with our cause has varied depending on their own relationship with the United States. Some European nations still hold colonies in their world, as it has been their contribution to history for hundreds of years.

Puerto Ricans have succeeded in their battle of maintaining a distinctive identity that took a thousand years to forge. Today, we are proud to be addressed as Puerto Ricans.

The real Bosnian story

Fanny Lou Hamer once said during the Civil Rights Movement that she became involved in the struggle for equality because "she was so sick and tired of being sick and tired." As a Muslim American, I too have become "sick and tired" of watching incredulously how my Muslim identity is slandered and degraded in comics, the media and movies without my having contributed to my own ignominy.

Nebila
KHATAK

The manufactured crisis of Islamic fundamentalism has posited the Islamic world as an ideological threat to liberal democracy. This new desert enemy has been bought, rather sadly, by far too many Americans as an inevitable truth. To students of history and politics the motives could not be clearer; the myth of Islamic fundamentalism is necessary to justify regional interests and continued production of arms. The mass media, our masterful puppeteer, on bidding carves an eleventh commandment into the public psyche through image warfare and tugs at the emotional strings of trusting Americans to shift from one fear to another. Without questioning the deeper motives of the administration and ignoring the trend of foreign policy in history lessons, American paranoia moves fluidly and effortlessly from "stinking enemies" to "camel riding niggers of Islam."

It is the very same racist, insidious hate campaign which has dehumanized and demonized Islam that is now responsible for the grotesque indifference by the European and United States' governments to the plight of Bosnians. There is a purposeful projection of the catastrophe in Bosnia-Herzegovina as a civil war between equally responsible parties in which the fabricated factionalization between Muslims, Croats and Serbs is given legitimacy. Many are not aware that "Muslim" is a created "ethnicity" in the greater Slavic race and that all three parties concerned are Slavs that share the same cultural and historical background. There are some, though few, Muslims who actually practice the religion of Islam. In fact, one can technically be a Muslim, but practice Catholicism.

This nominal categorization of the population into races was created by Tito and the Partisans after World War II and was based on the colonial strategy of divide and conquer, and not on an existing reality. The peaceful cohabitation of Croats, Muslims and Serbs for generations is clearly illustrated by the fact that over one third of the marriages are interracial — unimpeded by ethnocentric loyalties. Yet, it is the perception of the Serbian aggressors, the perpetrators of genocide, whose view we read and hear about. For example, the democratically-elected president of Bosnia is depicted as a leader of a Muslim-led government who has denied the minority Bosnian Serbs the right of representation. By carefully deleting the fact that the present-day government was elected by 65 percent of the population of which Serbs constitute 33 percent and Muslims 44 percent of the electorate and that this position rotates every two years between all three groups, media caters to the groundless claims of subjugation made by the chetniks.

In this regard, racial difference is depicted as a viable impetus for the conflict and not the rational used to further Serbian hunger for land acquisition. The verbal denunciation of the genocide of Muslims in newspapers and television, when depicted as a consequence of a conflict in which there is no distinction between aggressor and victim, loses all impact. While the international community gives ineffective lip-service to the suffering of Bosnians, it is insisting that Bosnia be carved into ethnic ghettos created by ethnic cleansing and denying a Muslim the power to be a democratic leader amongst Europeans.

Although the Bosnians have been living under the aegis of multiculturalism, it is no coincidence that 12 months ago people's identities as Muslims in Bosnia began to be associated with Islamic fundamentalism and despotic Arab rulers by their Serbian neighbors. Milosovic and his middlemen like Karazic were brilliant in calculating Islam as the point of divergence. They were aware that their strategy would simultaneously: create apathy on the part of Americans and Europeans; elicit fear in Bosnian Serbs of fundamentalism and regulate the responsibility of humanitarian aid to the Muslim world and make this into a problem for the Islamic world to deal with.

The false synonymity between Muslim and zealot/terrorist for the past decade evokes no world sympathy to the murder of innocent civilians. Furthermore, the recent racialization of Muslims as exclusively people of color who are associated with the Arab world has added a new dimension to anti-Muslim bigotry. Americans subconsciously connect Muslim and Arab, which further dismisses the senseless persecution of Bosnians from their minds. No one cares if brown babies die, if brown women are raped or if brown men are tortured. The mindset toward people of color seems to be that we are tortured like ants, infinite in supply so that a few thousand incinerated will not really affect our population — if anything it may help decrease over-population.

When it is a question of Muslim genocide, the international community finds itself in a crisis of leadership and hides behind the dubious and unsubstantiated notion that the former Yugoslavia is a political quagmire. When it is an issue of oil as was the blatant case in the Gulf War, the United States all too willingly appoints itself as the world's police force, armed with the sword of democracy and justifies intervention in the name of morality.

To those of us who hear and see that there have been around 50,000 systematic rapes of women, forceful impregnations and emigrations and concentration camps the basic issue could not be clearer. This is not only a Muslim problem, it is a problem for Whites, African-Americans, Jews, women, homosexuals and anyone else who can be targeted an victimized on the basis of difference. It is far from pleasant being a foe, a camel-riding nigger, in my own homeland. But I ask more importantly, if Muslims are the enemies of today, who will be the enemy of tomorrow?

Comic cracks up The Hatch

The Hatch

JESSICA TAVERNA / COLLEGIAN
Sarah Cytron inspires laughter.

There aren't many instances in which you are able to hear a woman speak freely on stage about being a "little butch" as a child. Saturday night at the Hatch was one of those rare occurrences.

Sara Cytron, a native Brooklyn lesbian, lit up the stage with her hysterical family anecdotes, and her overall humorous viewpoint of life through a lesbian's eyes.

Opening for her was the resident improv troupe, "Mission Improvable." Their performance elicited audience participation and proved to be spontaneously amusing.

After two years in Student Valley Productions, the Mission Improvable has managed to achieve great diversity and perform a semi-structural performance that keeps both the audience and performers on their toes.

The majority of their performance was monopolized by the "directed freeze" method. With this technique, the performers offered a setting and characters, and the audience was then encouraged to help manipulate the plot. Every few minutes the group would scream "freeze" and the audience was asked a question. The answer provided direction for the story line.

With skits like the "Lying Game," in which three contestants, Deanna Troy, an actor from the show Star Trek, Martha, a UMass telephone operator, and a neurotic man who portrayed a formerly abused child, all contended to see who would receive the title of "the best liar," and got the audience prepared for the comical excitement they would later experience from Cytron's performance.

After an intermission spent creating AIDS quilt squares, Cytron strutted onto the stage and attempted to explain the philosophies behind a New Yorker's language and thought processes, or lack thereof, behind this phenomena.

While making the audience cry from laughter, she managed to make several points concerning the irony that homosexuals are forced to deal with in society.

Cytron questioned whether the accusations by the Cardinal that homosexuals and activists were all going to go to hell implied that hell was a great place with a progressive government.

I am sure that memoirs of Cytron's nightmarish shopping sprees with her mom as a child touched a nerve that many in the audience could relate to. Talk of her mother's desire to see her in pink frilly dresses, reinforced by an over-emphasized "gorgeous," made Cytron look as if she wanted to wretch.

While attempting to break through stereotypes homosexuals are commonly branded with, Cytron proved herself to be a top notch comedian and made everyone feel comfortable enough to laugh at themselves, as well as at others.

Black Uhuru mixes music with politics

By MICHELE BAKIS
Collegian Staff

For almost 20 years, Black Uhuru has been successfully combining important social and political issues with their reggae music.

Duckie Simpson, Garth Dennis and Don Carlos composed the original group and recorded three albums together before Carlos left to pursue a solo career, and Dennis joined the Wailing Souls in 1977. Also at this time the new Black Uhuru was formed with original member Simpson and new member Michael Rose.

The Riddim Twins (Sly Dunbar and Robbie Shakesphere) as well as the late female vocalist Puma Jones joined the group and recorded such albums as Red and the Grammy-winning Anthem. After six albums and a Grammy, Rose left, and Delroy "Junior" Reed became the new male lead vocalist in 1987. The group's original members rejoined and in 1991 received a Grammy nomination for "Best Reggae Recording" for their 'reunion' album Now.

Now debuted at No. 2 on Billboard's World Music Chart and included songs "Freedom Fighter," "Peace and Love," as well as the popular Jimi Hendrix cover "Hey, Joe."

Mystical Truth, Black Uhuru's latest recording, follows in the tradition of music with a message. World hunger and racial injustice are just some of the issues addressed.

"Tip of The Iceberg," a warning for social change, features controversial rapper Ice T. "Tip of The Iceberg," probably the most recognized single from the album Iron Storm, won an award for its video depicted the Los Angeles riots and their aftermath.

Black Uhuru will be joined Tuesday night by Louie Rankin and Andrew Tosh. Tosh will be releasing an album this May. Rankin, an up-and-coming reggae/hip-hop artist, appears on Black Uhuru's new album Mystical Truth. Rankins' latest release, Showdown is dancehall music with a little hip-hop to back up Rankin's scratchy voice. This promises to be an interesting and energetic combination.

Black Uhuru is entertainment for the mind and soul. As they remind us in "Word Sound is Power." Whether you're looking for superior reggae music or have an interest in political thought, Black Uhuru's performance tonight should be satisfying.

Black Uhuru, along with Louie Rankin and Andrew Tosh, will be performing tonight at Pearl Street at 8 p.m. Tickets are available at the door.

TV anthology highlights NYC

By ADAM SCOTT ROBERTS
Collegian Staff

Tribeca
9-10 p.m. Tuesdays
Fox Television

The latest in television show production trends is to make a show revolve around people living in their unique little neighborhoods. If we run down the line, we've got Beverly Hills, 90210, Melrose Place, 2000 Malibu Road and a place called The Heights.

However, thanks to Robert De Niro and the continuing efforts of Fox Television's hope of becoming a full-fledged operating network, we are now brought to a place called Tribeca. No, it's not fictional like Northern Exposure's Cicely, it is a real chic Manhattan neighborhood located in a triangle below Canal Street, on New York City's lower west side. Appropriately enough we get Tri (for triangle) and Be (for below) and Ca (for Canal).

Tribeca's pilot episode brings us into the family of a young urban professional banker. Ernie is a well-to-do African American living out the American Dream of a happy life with his wife and two kids.

Ernie is a runner and while jogging through Battery Park he is chased down by three police officers. One is an undercover policeman. Immediately, Ernie yells "I'm not resisting," to the officers.

In a flash the undercover policeman tells the others to let Ernie go, "He's my brother." Ernie is about to explode with anger at his brother Marty — evidently the joke wasn't too funny to him.

Marty may be a police officer, but he still yearns to be like his older brother. When speaking to his sister-in-law Olivia, Marty describes Ernie: "He's like Colin Powell. He thinks that a successful Black man has certain ethical obligations."

Then, just as you're ready to skip to Roseanne with the clicker, something interesting happens — Ernie is gunned down for his gold watch while on his morning run.

The story begins to unfold and viewers are taken in.

Tribeca examines how the death of the father is affecting the family. Ernie's wife and brother-in-law become very close, with a hint that they may actually be together in the future. Ernie's son becomes angry, acts out his anger by stabbing a policeman's horse with a pencil and picks on his little sister.

An emotional scene unfolds in which Marty beats up the suspected murderer. As Marty cruelly beats the jailed man he yells out, "Nothing funny about a Black man in handcuffs."

Tribeca has the making of what quality television shows are made of: good dialogue, good storylines, good acting and superb directing. This show successfully rekindles the anthology drama series where each episode will continue with the two original character actors, Philip Bosco and Joe Morton and the other peoples' lives in a place called TriBeCa. A-

THE FAR SIDE By GARY LARSON

Quote of the Day

"You ain't never gonna be the man"
– From the movie Above the Law

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): A letter or phone call will brighten your morning. You may have a new interest in fashion or interior decorating. Consult reference books at your local library.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Put your creative talents on display so that others will benefit from them. Postpone major business negotiations until next week. Someone may question your integrity. Fight back!

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): The financial take from your endeavors may not be may not be sufficient. Seek new outlets for your many talents. You will find life much more enjoyable with the right partner. Pursue a romantic interest.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Self-improvement projects are very appealing now. Combine business with pleasure without being too obvious about your purpose. A friend offers helpful suggestions.

LEO (July 23-Aug.22): A loved one is especially helpful now. Teamwork will help advance special plans. A former romantic partner may re-enter the picture. Let this person know exactly where you stand.

VIRGO (Aug.23-Sept.22): Do some research and a secret fear will fly right out the window. Do not blame yourself or mate for family woes. Good news comes in a small package. Share your delight.

LIBRA (Sept.23-Oct.22): Beware of someone who comes on too strong, promising to do great things for you. Returning a phone call could reduce a financial burden. Forget false pride. Be more patient with a parent.

SCORPIO (Oct.23-Nov.21): Do not neglect your regular duties while handling a special project or you will lose as much as you gain. Your reputation for meeting deadlines is an important part of your success.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov.22-Dec.21): Imagination and change shape your life now. Maintain a positive attitude and you will find great rewards. Friendship could prove more satisfying than romance today.

CAPRICORN (Dec.22-Jan.19): Your presence will stop a quarrel. You may have judged someone too harshly. Do not be afraid to admit a mistake. Other people will respect you for speaking out. Carefully monitor expenses.

AQUARIUS (Jan.20-Feb.18): Bury the hatchet with a family member. Diplomacy will help you bring estranged relatives to the bargaining table. Buckle your seat belt on the roller coaster of romance.

PISCES (Feb.19-March 20): Very special things can occur in private today. Your treasure chest could be filled by those who possess the money to help you. Avoid signing unusual contracts or making big purchases.

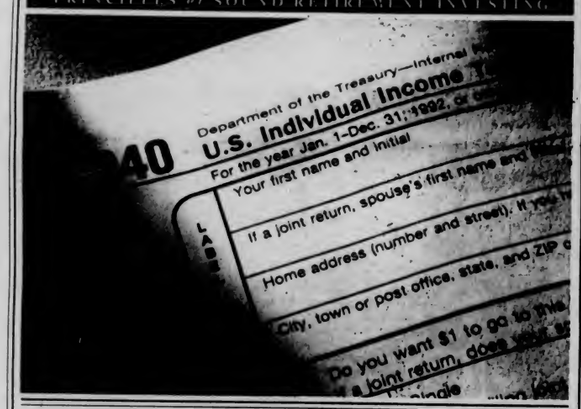
PRINCIPLES of SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING



UNFORTUNATELY, THIS IS WHERE PEOPLE ARE PUTTING TOO MANY RETIREMENT DOLLARS.

Every year, a lot of people make a huge mistake on their taxes. They don't take advantage of tax deferral and wind up sending Uncle Sam money they could be saving for retirement.

Fortunately, that's a mistake you can easily avoid with TIAA-CREF SRAs. SRAs not only ease your current tax-bite, they offer a remarkably easy way to build retirement income—especially for the "extras" that your regular pension and Social Security benefits may not cover. Because your contributions are made in before-tax dollars, you pay less taxes now. And since all earnings on your SRA are tax-deferred as well, the money you don't send to Washington works even harder for you. Down the road, that can make a dramatic difference in your quality of life.

What else makes SRAs so special? A range of allocation choices—from the guaranteed security of TIAA to the diversified investment accounts of CREF's variable annuity—all backed by the nation's number one retirement system.

Benefit now from tax deferral. Call our SRA hotline 1 800-842-2733, ext. 8016.

It is unrealistic to think that Wilkins will catch Jordan, but his comeback from the torn Achilles' tendon is amazing.

Atlanta has been on a down slope ever since they fired Hackensack High School alum and Czar of the Telestrator Mike Fratello. They've taken over as one of the hottest teams in the league, but don't they wish they took someone in last year's draft instead of Adam Keefe.

What happened to the 76ers?

Charles Barkley made his return to the Spectrum Sunday and deserved every bit of respect that he got. I remember when I first started watching hoops, as a Sixers fan, and loving when Philly picked Lord Charles.

However, as the years progressed, Harold "Don't call me Nick" Katz ruined the franchise that I used to love. I am no longer a Sixer fan, and I will never jump on the bandwagon again. When Philly traded its number one pick (namely Brad Daugherty) for Roy Hinson, I was finished with the pitiful Sixers and Mr. Katz. Hey, I already deal with one owner of a team I love. Can you say George?

Did you see that?

• Dikembe Mutombo's unusual triple double: 24 points, 16 rebounds, and 10 blocked shots. Mutombo has 26 blocked shots in his last three games.

• Sean "I've travelled the entire New England area in a week and a half" Hayden, Dave "To the moon" Gleeson, and Mike "The Cisco Kid" Morrissey winning the UMass Trivial Pursuit Championships at the Newman Center.

• I didn't think you did.

• The United States losing in the first round of the Davis Cup.

Minutemen split with Hawks in Philly

UMass' record now at 5-5 with doubleheader split

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts baseball team maintained its .500 record last weekend by winning one of two against Atlantic 10 rival St. Joseph's in Philadelphia.

Last Saturday, the Minutemen dropped the opener to the Hawks 10-7, but rebounded in the night cap to win 7-6. Sunday's contest was rained out, and will not be rescheduled.

The Minutemen rebounded strong after the loss in the opener, scoring four runs in the sixth inning as Jim Telgheder (2-2) picked up the win. Telgheder allowed six runs on 11 hits in six and two/thirds innings. Jay Murphy retired the last batter and picked up his second save of the year.

After falling behind 4-1 after four, the Minutemen shaved the lead to 4-3 in the top of the fifth inning, held the Hawks, then went ahead for good in the top of the sixth.

Freshman second baseman Mark Pileski drove in Bill Knight and Keith Richards with the go-ahead double that made the score 5-4 UMass. Justin Howard, who was 3-for-4 with 4 runs batted in, singled home Pileski and center fielder Nelson Ubaldo to put UMass up 7-4.

The Hawks put runs across in the sixth and seventh, and threatened for more in the seventh, but Murphy retired St. Joseph catcher Sean Vandegrift for the victory. Howard and Pileski were the hitting stars for the Minutemen, as Pileski hit 2-for-3 with 2 RBI. Bob Johnson (0-1) was the losing pitcher for St. Joe's.

In Saturday's first game, the Minutemen took early leads of 1-0 and 3-2 before the Hawks blew UMass out with five runs in the second inning (thanks to Jason Hamilton's grand slam) and three more in the third.

With a 10-3 lead after three, the Hawks cruised the rest of the way, although the Minutemen made it interesting with four runs in the last three innings. Eric Parker (1-0) earned the win for St. Joe's, allowing four runs on six hits in four innings.

Jeff Toothaker (2-2), who got knocked out in the second inning after allowing ten runs, took the loss for UMass. UMass fielders were no help, committing five errors as St. Joe's scored nine unearned runs.

"Toothaker struggled with his control," Stone said. "We struggled defensively."

Although the allowed 16 runs and committed nine errors, the Minutemen still grabbed a victory in the A-10, which as a conference is as tough as ever. Stone had some nice things to say about his team's performance.

"We swung the bats fairly well, although we left nine runners on base in the second game," said Stone. "We struggled a little."

Game Notes: Stone said he still doesn't know when Earl Lorden Field will be suitable for play. The Northeast is still suffering from the effects of the last week's storm, as today's game at Holy Cross was postponed, as was Thursday's scheduled homegame against Hartford.

The UMass baseball team has a 5-5 record for the young season.

Crew ready for season

Both men and women anxious to start

By GLEN GOLAND
Collegian Correspondent

Determination, desire, dedication, drive, destruction. One-hundred twenty-five members of the UMass Crew Club know all about these five words. Although crew is only a club sport at UMass, it has really taken off in recent years. Each year recruiting gets better and better, and so do the teams.

This year's teams hope to follow up successful fall campaigns with great spring seasons. Crew is a year-round sport, with team members practicing in the gym when when ice forced the teams indoors in November. Over the winter, the teams lifted weights, did aerobics, ran the stairs of the Graduate Tower and traveled to Georgia to prepare for the spring races.

In the fall, the teams raced against the clock, in three-mile "head" races. The spring races are 2000-meter sprints, against all the other teams at once. The "head" races take 10 to 15 minutes, while the sprints only take around six.

Varsity rower Kelly Ryan said she likes the spring races more because they are more of a challenge.

"I enjoy it more. I like knowing where you are compared to the other teams," Ryan said. "It's more aerobic, and it's more intense."

The crews compete in different weight classes at each race. The men's lightweights must weigh under 160 pounds, and the women's under 130. Men and women who weigh more compete in a heavyweight class.

Junior varsity and novice boats race at each meet as well. Each rower must spend one year as a novice before competing at the varsity level.

The women's team had a successful fall, bringing home five gold medals. The women's lightweight crew won the Head of the Schuylkill, a race widely considered the division championships, finishing first in a strong field of 15. The achievements of the fall squad have set high hopes for the spring squad.

After a competitive fall season, the men's team is also on the rise

Sophomore Savas Gunduz said he feels confident about the team's chances.

"With our new coach, Greg Siemenkowski, we worked really hard this winter, and I think our hard work will pay off in the spring," Gunduz said.

The crews will compete all around Massachusetts throughout April, before the two biggest races of the year in early May. On May 1, the Crews will participate in the New England Championships, on Lake Quinnsigamond. If the crews do well at Quinnsigamond, they will qualify for the Division II National Championships on May 16.

Both teams got off on the right foot Sunday, in their season openers. The men's lightweight, heavyweight, and novice teams celebrated victories over Harvard and Boston College. The women's lightweight, and heavyweight crews collected wins over BC as well.

Women's lax to return

By ANDREW BRYCE
Collegian Staff

Three years have passed since the University of Massachusetts last had a women's lacrosse team.

The UMass women's lax team finished the 1990 season with a 4-10 record, before succumbing to the University's budget cuts. The athletic program had to be cut in some way, and the women's team was one of those that were axed.

Now, it's the spring of 1993, and the women's lax team is starting over. The only remnants of the 1990 team are the five seniors on the squad. Co-captains Racheal Splaine and Melissa Celucci, Sam Eustace, Nancy Kane and Juliet Midlik were freshmen on that team.

UMass hired Yale women's lacrosse coach Fransesca DenHartoght to be the head coach, effective next season. Bob Little and Karen Marley will be the interim coaches for the 1993 season.

DenHartoght, a 1983 Harvard grad, has coached at Yale University for the last eight seasons, and has compiled a record of 45-54. In her last three seasons, however, she has guided the Lady Bulldogs to a 27-17 record and two Eastern College Athletic Conference championships.

DenHartoght has also played on three U.S. World Championship teams. Little said she sees the acquisition of DenHartoght as a plus for the women's lax team.

"(Fransesca) is one of the best players in the country as well as one of the top coaches," Little said. "To get her is a real coup. She's excellent."

DenHartoght obviously is not the only newcomer to the women's lacrosse program. The team is mostly made up of walk-ons. Some have played high school lacrosse, while others have not.

Even interim coach Little himself, a soccer coach at Amherst College during the fall season, has only coached lacrosse on the high school level. Little admits that this season will be a learning experience for everyone involved.

"We have our work cut out for ourselves," Little said. "We just want to get better everyday. To work on basic skills, tactics, and techniques of the game, and just improve everywhere."

UMass will go up against the likes of Harvard, which captured the national women's lacrosse championships and were runner-ups last year. UMass will also play Vermont, Boston College and Dartmouth, all top 30 teams.

"We can't measure ourselves against the teams we are playing yet," Little said. "If we do that, it will be very discouraging. We will measure ourselves with ourselves. And as long as we keep improving everyday, we will get there. It's a slow, building process."

Coaches Little and Marley are relying on the five seniors, led by Spillaine. Little sees Spillaine as the standout player.

"Racheal played a lot as a freshman. She is perhaps our most skilled player," Little said. "We are learning a lot from Racheal."

The women's lacrosse team will have to go through a rebuilding process in the immediate future because of the two-year layoff. Little is confident that UMass can become a national power in the years to come.

Reflections on Celtics, Luther and Knicks-Suns

NOTES FROM THE HARDWOOD
by Art Stapleton

Well, I've held out long enough. . . how about the Celtics? Boy, they are really playing well.

It is time for another edition of Notes from the Hardwood, the endless trip around the world of roundball. I have been criticized recently for totally ignoring the Celtics, and glorifying the New Jersey Nets.

I plead the Fifth, but will devote some space to Boston, everyone's favorite team. From the Chief and Alaa Abdelnaby smoking the ganja to Sherman Douglas' emergence from the shadow of Dwayne "The Pearl" Washington, the Celtics have shot on to the scene, bolting ahead of Chuck Daly's Blue Cross Bunch.

Reggie Lewis does not get the respect he deserves. Enough said. As far as Alaa goes, his quote on the winning streak says it all.

"We've just got to stay high," said the all-knowing one. Hhmm, isn't it about time that Alaa and friends come to UMass and join the Cannabis Reform Coalition.

Enough on the Celtics, because it is time to turn to bigger and better things — the Collegian and the annual Stay Off The Student Union Steps And Forget About Protesting For A While Jam. It's no longer a rumor, and the newsroom squad is filling up.

We've adopted a new slogan for the game, and yes, it is similar to something the Minutemen used this season: Refuse to Booze.

Some players have signed on to play, such as Matt "I don't cut backdoor" Vautour, Glen "His Boy Elroy" Goland and Kendra "Where there's a will there's a" Willett. It should be interesting, but I have a feeling that I'll dominate, despite what Jalen Crofts thinks. O.K., I'll be lucky if I see anything but the pine, but it is good to be optimistic.

Around the NBA: Luther Wright, you clown. South Orange, New Jersey won't miss you. How can you possibly apply for the NBA Draft? You have proved nothing in college.

Come on, you played 13 minutes against Western Kentucky. The Hilltoppers. Darnell Mee and friends. If it was any real big man in college, he would have dominated. Now your agent says the Celtics are interested in your services. Yeah, by the way, the Nets called me up to practice against Chris Dudley (only to teach him how to shoot free throws).

Basketbrawl.

Arch-rivals. I thought it just was an arcade game. Phoenix and the Knicks. Doc Rivers and KJ. Oh boy, hockey fans must be getting anxious for the NBA playoffs. Peter Vecsey said that Pat Riley will probably be suspended if New York fights again.

Excuse me, Mr. Bettman, but did David Stern trade you for the fighting policy of the NHL?

Nique is back.

Dominique has gone from a dunk artist who couldn't throw one in the ocean to a steady three-point bomber. What is going on here? Wilkins is on a tear, having scored 30 or more points in eight of the last 10 games.

The Hawks have won four in a row, and 10 of their last 11, with Dominique chasing Michael for the scoring title.

Press conference held to dispel media coverage

By TAMI MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

Friends of James Cyr denounced what they called unfair media coverage of his impending trial on charges of murder, arson, violation of a restraining order and assault with a deadly weapon, at a press conference Tuesday night in the Cape Cod Lounge.

Cyr was arrested and charged with the murder of Tara Hartnett. Hartnett was stabbed and her Sunderland apartment was set on fire March 20. She died of smoke inhalation.

"We knew James as a kind, loving and gentle person," Sonia Paz, 20, said. "The person I know would never have done this."

Paz, a junior journalism major, said she is concerned about the amount of apathy toward Cyr's case and fears his portrayal in the media will affect his trial.

"James is getting a raw deal," Paz said.

"We don't feel he's going to get a fair trial," she said. "This trial is moving way too fast."

Paz said she met Cyr through the Third World department of WMUA.

"The James I know was always there for me," she said. She said Cyr had dropped out of school to support his 11-month-old daughter Meghan and that he went on public assistance to cover the baby's medical costs. Cyr was in a legal battle with Hartnett over custody of their child.

Clinton's plan gains ground in Congress

By ALAN FRAM
Associated Press

WASHINGTON – House-Senate negotiators agreed Tuesday to a compromise five-year plan for cutting the deficit by just under $500 billion, a measure that would lay the foundation for enactment of President Clinton's economic program.

Congressional sources said the agreement would be announced Wednesday and would be followed quickly by House and Senate votes. Few details of the compromise were immediately available.

The plans were similar to begin with since both were based on Clinton's proposals: tax increases on the rich, defense cuts and other savings, along with increased spending on certain domestic programs, including highways and federal research.

Majority Democrats hoped to pass the legislation in the House as early as Wednesday, and the Senate the next day. It would be the earliest a deficit-reduction plan was approved since the budget law was enacted in 1974.

In reaching a compromise, the Senate agreed to lower its total tax increase by roughly $22 billion to about $273 billion over five years. The House, meantime, backed away from the tough limits it sought on cost-of-living increases for federal workers and retirees, said the sources, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Like the House-passed version, the compromise package would also hold spending on defense and most domestic programs over the next five years to no more than the $548 billion the government will spend this year.

The outline of the savings package was included in a $1.5 trillion budget for fiscal 1994, which starts on Oct. 1. The measure, which does not require the president's signature, sets goals for tax and spending bills lawmakers will consider later this year.

The agreement came as Democrats erased an embar-

Asian night celebrates diversity of community

By KENNETH MAISONET
Collegian Staff

Last Friday the University of Massachusetts Asian American Student Association hosted the 10th Annual Asian Night celebration.

Aproximately 1,400 people from as far as the Boston area attended the annual event. Asian Night is an organized cultural activity, sponsored every year by Asian-American Student Association since the organization's inception in 1983.

Students of Asian/Asian-American backgrounds came together in an effort to raise the awareness of their identities, have a focal point from which to draw strength and inspiration and celebrate their respective cultures, organizers said.

Paul Gee, president of AASA, who played a major role in organizing the event, said he believes the organization's goals came across strongly through the event.

"We gave all our time and energy to focus on the more important issues and send a strong message to the UMass community," Gee said.

AASA's goals on this campus are to provide Asian and Asian-American students with a concrete foundation whether socially, educationally or by political means.

The organization also to seeks to promote the views, voices and experiences of the Asian/Asian-American campus community to further their education in their own historical roots, and to help create a safer environment for all people to share and understand one another, according to the organization's constitution.

Lisa Young, a freshman AASA member, said she became involved because she wanted to be part of the community and have an infinity with the Asain/Asian-Americans attending the university.

"I've been dealing with racial harassment all my life, and AASA provided a forum from which I could help partake in raising the awareness of issues that we encounter," Young said.

The evening's program opened up with 'Retrospective Slide Show' which brought to the attention the organization's 10 years of continuous effort, progress and achievements made on behalf of students.

John Wong, a senior and co-producer of Asian Night, has been instrumental in bringing together the various cultural groups that made Asian Night work.

"I became more active in this because I truly felt I could make a difference," Wong said. "Through voices, sound, visual props and taste our message was universal, so people could understand and join us in breaking down the barriers that have been erected by racism and ignorance."

"The education and collaboration of AASA's leadership represents the changing dynamism in society and represents a progressive movement towards establishing a better future," Wong said.

The fashion show displayed costumes from traditional to more contemporary designs.

More noticeably traditional costumes appeared from respective cultures such as Chinese, Korean, Japanese, Indian, Shan

Correction

A quote in the Tuesday, March 30 issue of the Collegian was incorrectly attributed to Joan Stoia, the director of the Mather Career Center.

The quote, by Amherst Town Manager Barry Del Castilho, should have read "For those of us who dedicate our lives to public service, it's a little bit disconcerting to see what's happening to the reputation of public service, and to see how often community service is an alternative to a jail sentence, as opposed to something people should think about doing as part of their contribution to their community." The Collegian regrets the error.

Sarajevo still under fire despite truce

By DAVID CARBY
Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzeoovina — The United Nations rushed to get more aid into the shell-shattered Muslim enclave of Srebrenica today, and officials tried to build on a truce that entered its third day.

The French general who commands U.N. soldiers in Bosnia, Philippe Morillon, said the U.N. was seeking to follow up quickly on the truce by reaching an agreement for free movement in and out of Sarajevo.

"The time of hostages is over," Morillon told reporters in Sarajevo. "The time of peace is at the gates."

But Bosnian radio warned listeners to be wary of snipers in Sarajevo, and U.N. spokesman Commander Barry Frewer said the cease-fire, which began Sunday, was "holding, but very tenuously."

U.N. observers recorded sporadic violations of the cease-fire, including 13 mortar rounds fired on the western outskirts of Sarajevo and 10 artillery rounds fired in the area of Bihac in government-held northwestern Bosnia.

Frewer said the U.N. lodged protests in cases where the violator could be identified.

On Monday, more than 2,300 refugees fled the cold, hunger and fear of besieged Srebrenica and reached Tuzla, 45 miles northwest after a tortuous day-long journey.

The refugees — women, children and old men — were packed so tightly into the 19 U.N. trucks that they had to stand on their luggage.

Student Senate Update

The following motions are on the agenda for debate and voting for the meeting of the Undergraduate Student Senate on Wed., March 31, 1993 at 7:00p.m. in the Campus Center 163. All members of the University community are invited to attend and speak on any motions that come up at the meeting. As the Student Senate is the representative body of all UMass undergraduates, the University community is encouraged to attend and be aware of the motions and opinions it passes.

The following items are on the agenda for March 24, 1993. Elections will be held for the positions of SGA Treasurer and Speaker of the Senate. There is also a proposed amendment to the SCERA Charter.

Prof. lectures on Christianity and science

By MATTHEW McCARTHY
Collegian Correspondent

Christ and science are directly related according to a leading cosmologist and historian of science, who lectured last Sunday night at the Newman Center.

Rev. Dr. Stanley L. Jaki, a Benedictine Priest and a distinguished professor from Seton Hall University, has written over thirty books on religion and science and has lectured at over 70 universities worldwide.

A crowd of about 70 people gathered in the chapel to hear Jaki's lecture titled, 'Christ and Science'. This lecture was part of the Cardinal Newman Lecture Series. Material for the speech was taken from his book, "The Savior of Science."

Jaki began his lecture by describing the central conflict of religion and science and the view of Christ as an otherworldly figure who offered his followers suffering and spoke of a different place, the kingdom of God. While science was a power that offered truth and a plentiful existence. In the beginning, he said, it was believed that the church had to be discredited to push science into the forefront of modern thought.

"Western culture believed that science was man's true savior," he said.

Jaki brought the two together as he argued his main points.

"Why has Christianity prospered in the age of science more than any other religion?" he asked.

Jaki answered that Western culture is primarily a Christian culture. It has also been the leader in science and because of this it has dominated other cultures for hundreds of years.

Jaki described science as, "nothing more than a

Program aims to 'bridge worlds'

University professors offer support to urban areas

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

A new program at the University of Massachusetts is working to increase the University's efforts to reach out to minority students, according to organizers of the group.

Steve Satell, the director of the Bridging Worlds Program, said the program aims at building bridges from UMass to urban communities and making the University environment more accessible to students from inner city environments.

Satell said the program, which is currently sponsored by Afro-American Studies Professors John Bracey and Michael Thelwell, also tries to make high school students realize that they can come to a university environment and succeed.

"Each world has it's own lingo," Satell said. "We know much more than we think. . . once language is broken down, learning becomes step-by-step."

Satell said previous work he has done in Philadelphia taught him that he could "bridge worlds between the urban environment and the school world."

Satell said the program invited approximately 20 high school students from Lowell and 25 from Springfield to watch the movie Stand and Deliver, a film about a California high school mathematics teacher who motivates students from the inner city to higher levels of academic achievement.

UMass students can become involved in the program as an independent study, receiving credit for doing outreach as well as assigned readings and answering study questions, under the sponsorship of a professor who usually teaches in their major.

Satell said nine students are currently participating in the program as an independent study, with 15 doing outreach.

Satell added that he hopes the program will become an official class offered through the Collegiate Committee for Education of Black and other Minority Students next year.

Satell said the program plans to invite another group of high school students to UMass late in April to watch another movie and see the University.

Also, UMass students involved in the Bridging Worlds Program will participate in Community Service Day on May 1, Satell said.

Sid Ferreira, an academic advisor for the CCEBMS, said Bridging Worlds seeks to motivate high school students to realize they can attend a University if they work hard enough.

"Inner city kids want to go to college, so we bring them in and have students and administrators talk to them and tell them they can come to the university," Ferreira said. "We allow them to visualize the physical setting of a campus to basically motivate them."

"We want to get minority students exposed to the the University, to help reflect that UMass is the state's flagship university," Ferreira said. "

Satell said the program is funded through the Massachusetts Foundation, a private non-profit corporation. Satell said he hopes the University will "chip in their fair share" in the future.

He added that Bridging Worlds is planning to hold a fund-raiser in the near future, with a company called

Referral service provides information for county

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

One of the oldest information and referral services in the country is based right here in Amherst, but ask any passerby on North Pleasant Street if they've heard about the agency and they will probably say no.

For 17 years, First Call For Help, which resides on the third floor of the Jones Library on Amity St., has provided free and confidential service to thousands of Hampshire County residents. The agency, much to the surprise of its directors, still remains unknown to many people.

"People have an assumption that a service like ours doesn't exist so they don't try to contact us," said administrative coordinator JoAnn James. "I'd like to get the word out about the good we do for the community."

First Call is an information and referral service that provides a link between the client and the services which are available to that client. The extensive data base they maintain provides information about local and state programs, support groups, clubs, etc. at the touch of a button.

"We are the community's central switchboard," said director Nancy Cowen, who works part time at the agency along with eight other staff members, including three work study students from the University of Massachusetts. "First Call answers questions on everything from AIDS to preventing foreclosure to running for public office. We save other businesses and organizations a lot of time and energy."

Although First Call is open to everyone, almost 75 percent of its clients are women. In the last few years, however, there have been more and more "first time" clients who are both male and female.

"Most of these people have never before needed public assistance but are forced to use it now," said Cowen, in reference to the tough economic times the region now faces. "They are apprehensive and embarrassed, asking for help only when their personal resources are exhausted, the bills are overdue, or their housing is in jeopardy."

First Call handles these requests at a much lower cost than any other agency. In fiscal year 1992, their service to Amherst residents cost the town less than $2.00 per client contact, no matter how much time, research or case coordination was required.

The recent recession has put funding for the agency in jeopardy, raising the possibility that many of First Call's clients will turn to town hall, other municipal offices, the libraries, or the wrong agencies for help.

"Not only would this lower the productivity of these places, but it would mean frustration and misunderstanding for clients and workers alike because only First Call has the broad but detailed

PFLAG helps parents

Local group supports GLB families

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

The Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays (PFLAG) is an organization that exists to support gays, lesbians and bisexuals and their families.

The national federation of PFLAG was first organized in 1981 and is now made up of more than 300 regional chapters. The mission of PFLAG includes support, education and advocacy.

Jean Genasci, the northeast regional director of PFLAG, helps set up new chapters in the area. The northeast region includes the six New England states and the Canadian provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland.

Genasci said the PFLAG support groups come in three levels. The first level is the household level, where there is a small group used as a contact. The next level is a larger group that meets in a home or public space. Finally, the group forms a chapter that can have as many 100 members.

"Support is available at all locations and people are encouraged to participate at their own level of comfort," Genasci said.

PFLAG has a "respect all youth" program which generates three issue papers. These papers deal with GLB teen suicide, GLB teens at risk and youth and homosexuality. These papers are designed for

Other participants also said Cyr was a devoted father.

"He was one of the most proud fathers I've ever met," said a man who would only identify himself as Alex. He said he remembered Cyr bringing Meghan to the Campus Center Concourse.

"To me he's still a great friend," Alex said. "He hasn't been proven guilty."

Alex said he expressed condolences to the Hartnett family.

Those present also said they feared with the rise of domestic violence, and attention to the issue, that Cyr would be used as an example.

"I hope and pray he is not used as a scapegoat," Michelle Moran, 20, said. Moran left the podium in tears after she said Cyr was both mother and father to his daughter, Meghan.

Paz said Cyr was an active student and he was a member of WMUA and a fraternity brother. Paz said that it was Cyr who first issued a restraining order against Hartnett.

Paz said she visited Cyr at the Franklin County House of Corrections where he is being held without bail. She said Cyr told her not to believe everything she read in the newspapers.

Paz would not comment on who might have murdered Hartnett. She said the press conference was being held to discuss Cyr as a person, not to speculate on his guilt or innocence.

Forum analyzes GLB issues

Gays, lesbians and bisexuals on campuses across the country need a nationwide correspondence agency, said Curt Shepard, the co-chair of the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force's (NGLTF) Board of Directors.

Shepard led a discussion session on Friday at the office of the Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns, located in Southwest. Students from the Five-College system were invited to come and share their ideas about forming a national task force and discuss the needs of GLB students, staff and faculty.

"NGLTF is hoping to provide campus based constituencies with resource materials about leadership development, as well as link up people on campuses to the broader GLB movement," said Shepard. "Basically, we're looking to link campuses up with each other."

Other goals of NGLTF include publishing a quarterly newsletter, producing organizing manuals and "how to" materials and developing the campus programming track at the annual Creating Change conference, where gays, lesbians and bisexuals discuss acceptance problems.

"We also want to be able to computerize the Task Force," said Shepard. Digital Queers, a computer company, is currently working with the Task Force to upgrade its system. Digital Queers is hoping to create a system that will reach every active campus and provide information about what is happening on other campuses. Digital Queers will be donating the necessary equipment and trainers to teach the Task Force how to properly use the system.

"Right now there is no place to find out what is going on with the concerns affairs of the other campuses across the country, and this system, along with our other efforts will hopefully solve that problem," Shepard said.

Students who attended the discussion said they are hopeful that these new changes will make the Task Force a more effective way of conveying the concerns of GLB students on campuses nationwide. They also expressed discomfort with what one student called "the multiculturalism division of UMass."

The students in attendance also said they felt GLB issues are not included with the major parts of the charter of UMass' multicultural campus affairs and activities. Specifically, they said they feel their efforts are overlooked and the administration is apathetic toward GLB activities on campus.

Clinton plans to aid Russia

By BARRY SCHWEID
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Demobilized Russian soldiers without homes or jobs could create tensions unless the United States lends a helping hand, Secretary of State Warren M. Christopher told a congressional hearing today.

He said Americans would be sent to Russia to help supervise housing construction as one of the projects President Clinton is considering in an aid package to support President Boris N. Yeltsin.

Christopher told a Senate Appropriations subcommittee the aid "should not be portrayed here or there as charity" but as an investment in American security.

The demobilization of hundreds of thousands of soldiers is the result of the end of the Cold War and the withdrawal of former Soviet forces from Eastern Europe.

"They don't have housing. They don't have jobs," Christopher told the Appropriations foreign operations subcommittee. "You can just see the kind of tension created."

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the panel's chairman conceded "foreign aid is not the most popular issue" this year, but cautioned that nothing is more important for U.S. security than the success of economic reform in Russia.

Christopher also drew support from the subcommittee's ranking Republican, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, who encouraged him to expand aid to Russia and to other deserving countries. "We cannot help secure democracy in Russia by pinching pennies," he said.

McConnell offered a proposal to send American volunteers to Russia to help construct new homes for the returning troops. Christopher promptly endorsed the idea as similar to the program Clinton is considering.

With the Clinton-Yeltsin summit set for this weekend, Christopher said he could not say how much a Russia aid package would cost, "The final decisions have not been made," he said.

Whiny letter justifies rage

Since it was still a week until April Fool's Day, I was surprised to read Christopher Miles' ridiculous "attack" on the women's movement [Collegian, March 26]. Chris, after a heart-wrenching "struggle with his soul," has finally reached the conclusion that all of us feminists, who by description are simply supporters of equal rights for women, are "lesbian Nazis." While still in shock from just learning I was a lesbian, Chris then informed me that I was a "whiny, pathetic little girl." Excuse me, have we met? I find it funny he accuses the women's movement of being whiny. What would you call your letter, Chris? It's whiny with a capital "w" — in fact, it sounds like you just got dumped. And no, we don't want something to rage at, we've already got it — your letter made that perfectly clear.

Chris, who apparently is an authority on violence against women, informs us that date rape is an "imaginary situation." I know several victims who would be very interested in discussing this with you. Or better yet, why don't you volunteer time at the Rape Crisis Center: tell them face to face that they only imagined it.

Chris, your letter was so completely foolish, I feel somewhat guilty justifying it with a response. You obviously do not understand the women's movement because you've missed the point entirely. Feminism has nothing to do with hating men, opening car doors or shaving legs. Women don't dislike you because you're a "White male at UMass;" we dislike you because you're an idiot. It is you hiding behind your gender, not I. So the next time you go spewing off in a public forum, why don't you choose something you're remotely qualified to discuss.

My own date rape 'myth'

I heard someone say this week that date rape was a myth. Feminists just conjured this warped scenario up in their head, like regular Amy Fishers. I remember feeling a little confused after hearing this. I wasn't sure how to react to such a strident claim. I sat for a while in silence. I guess it never happened I told myself.

E.C.
THOMAS

Those memories that have been tormenting me for three years — were just something that I had made up because, I don't know. . . I was bored. Those memories that have kept me awake at night, fearful to fall asleep to that look in his eye. . . were just some mind game that I was playing after reading a Steven King novel.

And so I sat, silent. Silence is a scary thing, isn't it? It can be our best friend and it can be our worst enemy. I haven't decided yet which one applies to me. Some might think that a silent cry is one that is never heard. Only I cried that night and I know he heard me.

It's a myth, it never happened. I remember when I spent a year of my life saying the exact thing to myself. Over and over and over again. It never happened, it never happened. But as much as I tried to shut it out, the haunting effect of someone's hands gripping your wrists holding them over your head as they spread apart your legs with their knee. . . well, the pain just doesn't really go away all together.

It's funny how we all wish we could erase a certain part of our memories at one time or another. I remember wishing that I had the ability to turn my finger into an eraser, reach into my mind and just erase, erase, erase. Then it would be okay, then it would have been a myth.

I remember when I was little my mother used to read me fairy tales about the prince saving the princess, running away with her, getting married and living happily ever after. That love, that trust of two people, was beautiful to me. . . but as I grew older I realized it was a myth.

Trust. Well, nowadays I'd say that was one of the biggest myths of all. I trusted him, and now I'm left with these memories that will never go away, that will never leave me be. For nearly three years now, I've tried desperately to figure out for myself if it was a myth or not.

I wonder if the man who said that has ever replayed something in his mind over a thousand times within one week. Trying to make some sense of a situation that didn't have any sense. Trying to decide how many times you screamed NO, and if during those times he heard you, if you had said it enough, if you could have fought harder or cried, screamed, done something louder, better.

So you sit in silence as your friends talk of their night out, going over and over it in your head, thinking someday maybe the tape will run out. Wishing someday that the night you lost a large part of yourself never happened; the night your heart broke, your trust disappeared and your smile vanished was all in your head.

And so I sat in silence for three years pretending it was a myth, but I'm not living happily ever after.

GLB — emotions, not ideology

As a guy who likes other guys, I am heartened to learn of the effectiveness of the GLB Speakers Bureau in broadening the perspective of the ill-informed masses [Collegian, March 29].

To supplement or reiterate the disclaimer the speakers use, to be gay, lesbian or bisexual (should one choose to define it as such) is not a "point of view," nor is it one or a set of "opinions." Everyone has affectional and sexual preferences. There is no community or "ideology" that each of us represents.

We are just folks of varying experiences, religious beliefs, family backgrounds, degrees of self-acceptance, security, fashion sense — even varying degrees of oppression — in a society that is fraught with prejudice (misinformed opinions, usually negative) about human behavior and its implications.

Being gay, lesbian bisexual or whatever does not necessitate an ideology. We're talking about emotions that we were neither asked or forced to feel, unlike homophobia which, in its varying forms, is as much a part of our society as the Catholic Church in its varying forms. A feeling can be neither argued nor disagreed with.

To conceptualize a "GLB community" is to homogenize a, forgive me, diverse and massive group of individuals here and around the world. So get to know a few of us and broaden your perspective. Get to know many of us and you may be surprised, as I was, that "sexual preference" is just one important lens through which one perceives himself or herself and the world. Sexuality might be, but its manifestations are not genetic. Read up, and come out.

Columnist negates Asian efforts

This is in response to the editorial by Shyamala Ivatury [Collegian, March 29] titled, "Asian heritage exploited." Certain points presented in that editorial pertaining to Western atrocities against Asia and its peoples were legitimate and well brought up. However, it was totally wrong to use Asian Night as a springboard for these points, and in doing so negating all the effort, cooperation and hard work put into Asian Night.

The purpose of Asian Night was to celebrate the rich culture and heritage Asians and Asian Americans have brought to this country, and to educate people about this culture. The "dancing, singing and twirling in brightly colored garbs" is all a part of that celebration, and shouldn't be discounted because it doesn't reflect the horrors of humanity. That simply wasn't the purpose of Asian Night. The purpose was to celebrate Asia.

Asian Night was not just "singing and dancing." If you happened to miss it, there was an excellent skit, dedicated to slain Asian American Vincent Chin, which explored many of the turbulent emotions and issues Asian and Asian American students face every day. The slide show that opened up the evening's events showed the many faces of Asians and Asian Americans on the UMass campus, and introduced the Asian American Students Association, a very active organization in dealing with Asian issues. Master Lee, touted as a "true" Asian American comedian, made the audience crack up with his "truly" Asian American brand of comedy.

And so what if there was singing and dancing and twirling and enjoying of ethnic foods? Doesn't every culture have the right to?

Your points were all well taken and, being an Asian woman myself, I empathized with a lot of your anger and frustration at the wrongs done to Asian cultures throughout history. But it takes things like Asian Night, and the education and positive attitude it brings, to change all that. Then maybe one day we'll be able to celebrate, and not have to think about the bad things.

North Korea strikes first blow to US hegemony

The first major blow to the New World Order (global U.S. hegemony) has been struck. North Korea, an independent socialist state in East Asia, has given the requisite 90 days notice and is formally withdrawing from the Non-Proliferation Treaty. The NPT is one of the most important cornerstones of the New World Order and the U.S. can hardly imagine a more damaging precedent. The most important fact is that for once, there is nothing whatsoever the almighty Americans can do about it.

Korea is a small peninsula, no bigger than New England, with a population of 65 million, 43 million of whom reside in the occupied territories below the 38th Parallel, also known as South Korea.

Since the 1945 U.S. invasion of Korea, the southern portion of the country has become a colonial military base for the United States military. It is the U.S. that has introduced nuclear and rocket weaponry in the Korean peninsula, which has deployed over 40,000 troops to plunder the rural lands of the peninsula, and conduct provocative annual war game manuevers known as Team Spirit.

The U.S. and it's South Korean puppet regime sustained one of the most brutal counter-insurgency campaigns in Asia. Over 100,000 people were massacred even before the actual war broke out in 1950. Ground troops who were operating under a smoke screen of airborne destruction left in their wake the horror of mass devastation. By the time the United Nations forces pushed into North Korea, the U.S. had plastered the north with millions of gallons of napalm and other explosives. Within five months of the start of the war, the U.S. officially grounded its bomber force because "there were no more targets to hit." U.S. military leaders referred to what had been done in Korea in terms of "the worst slaughter ever known." More bombs were dropped in Korea between 1950 to 1953 then the whole of Europe in World War II. The U.S. not only burned most of the peninsula, but also "incinerated unknown hundreds of thousands of Koreans with napalm, drove much of the rest of the population and industry underground, and finally bombed irrigation dams (last done by the Nazis and deemed a war crime at Nuremburg)." In an interview given in 1954, Douglas MacArthur said, "I would have dropped between 30 and 50 atomic bombs . . . across the neck of Manchuria." Later he planned to "spread from the sea of Japan to the Yellow Sea [i.e., across the middle of North Korea] a belt of radioactive cobalt . . . it has an active life of between 60 and 120 years."

U.S. military aggression in Korea is more obvious during Team Spirit. Over 80,000 troops arrive on the peninsula for three weeks and put on a massive show of force, marching up and down the center of the country. These belligerent war games have proven to be unmistakably threatening. Reports have been filed this year against the South and its Western overlord of gun fire being shot across the Panmunjum boaders threatening the security of the North.

North Korea is believed to be developing a nuclear weapon which has everybody in the West scratching their heads, wondering what to do. The answer is simple — the U.S. can't do anything. The great white giant of the past has become the funny dwarf of East Asia.

In early March, North Korea withdrew from the Non-proliferation treaty causing much consternation especially in the white man's nuclear club.

The NPT is an offensive document that maintains nuclear monopolistic control for the northern white powers, plus China. The document divides the world into "nuclear-weapon" states and "non-nuclear weapon" states. A nuclear weapon state is one that has exploded a bomb before 1967. Such states are exempted from pledging not to manufacture nuclear explosives and from International Atomic Energy Atomic inspections, making them first class international citizens.

Sandra
ROSE

The IAEA was created by the U.S. in 1957 to ensure that it could inspect and control all nuclear programs except its own.

It is apparent that the U.S. policy of international Jim Crow is carried out by the NPT and IAEA. When Israel and South Africa, white European settler-colonial states, acquired nuclear weapons there was not an "urgent and essential need to allow the agency to carry out any additional inspections," as they said of North Korea. As long as such weapons are in white hands, little fear of "irrational" misuses are voiced, however hysteria accompanies all Third World deterrent protests.

North Korea has not violated any treaty obligations and has done nothing wrong. The U.S. in fact is the only country that has used nuclear weapons, has the largest arsenal of weapons, and indeed has threatened North Korea itself (and other countries) with nuclear attack at a time when Korea was defenseless.

The U.S. claims that North Korea's nuclear development program is not a result of a people defending themselves but a way for leader Kim Jong Il to increase his own power. However, with over 40,000 troops stationed in the South, another 40,000 troops in the neighboring Okinawa naval base in Japan, and 80,000 more troops ready for deployment at the sound of a single command, there is a serious threat of U.S. military aggression. While nuclear weapons have supposedly been removed from South Korea, nuclear capable U.S. ships are coming into the South Korean ports. The U.S. will neither confirm nor deny the presence of nuclear weapons.

The U.S. have placed all the political, economic, cultural, and military affairs of South Korea under their control by luring South Korea with so-called "aid" as bait. Under the signboard of "joint defense" the U.S. army commander in fact has absolute supreme command over South Korean troops. Part of the military expenses that upkeep the puppet army of the South is paid for directly by U.S. military aid. It is cheaper to maintain these mercenary forces and give Koreans a false sense of "helping" preserve the country's interests.

Unlike South Korea, the North Korean state has been independent from foreign domination, whether from Washington, Moscow, or even Beijing, and from manipulation. The state practices the principle concepts of JUCHE — discarding the spirit of dependence, displaying the spirit of self-reliance and solving one's own affairs under all circumstances. North Korea remained steadfast and strong throughout the Cold War and is an example of a successful independent country in the New World Order.

Life expectancy in North Korea is 70-74 years, virtually all adults are literate, and 99 percent of infants have been immunized compared to 79 percent in South Korea. Women make up 46 percent of the labor force, compare that figure to South Korea's 33.9 percent. Women in North Korea comprise 25 percent of the Parliament compared to 2 percent in South Korea and a pathetic 7 percent in the U.S.

The immoral and degrading behavior of U.S. troops in South Korea has led to an increased number of rapes and deaths of Korean women. The racist arrogance of red neck GI's has alienated most of the South Korean population. Fortunately, the northern half of the peninsula has been immune to such barbarity after closing its borders to such scoundrels.

North Korea stands in solidarity with other countries pursuing liberation from western colonialism. One of the most important international functions of North Korea is it's role as one of the few indepeudent Third World sources of defense technology. For example, North Korea has provided Scud-B missiles to both Iraq and Iran, nations badly in need of defense support. Furthermore, North Korea provides colonized peoples with moral and diplomatic support. For example, Kim il Sung, North Korean leader has boldly stated, "The Arab peoples are valiantly fighting with arms in their hands against the brazen gangster-like invasion of the Israeli expansionists and their manipulators the imperialists led by the U.S. imperialists. The anti-U.S., anti-Israeli struggle waged by the Arab people's today is a just struggle to defend national independence and dignity, to restore the occupied Arab territory and accomplish the Palestinian people's cause of liberation."

Needless to say, it would be ideal for the world to be rid of nuclear weapons. But as long as Britain, France, Russia, the U.S., and Israel stockpile vast nuclear arsenals subjecting the Third World to nuclear blackmail, no state can be expected to leave itself to their tender mercies. After all, the U.S. threatened to NUKE North Korea just 40 years ago.

The NPT as a centerpiece of the colonial New World Order must be smashed! North Korea shows the Third World the way to the future, and liberation through independence and strength. The New World Order stops here and the Americans are powerless to do anything! JUCHE!

Beware of administration's so-called generosity

Please don't get happy when the administration tells you they are going to perform a so-called act of kindness. As soon as they claim they are going to perform an action then we should all be on guard because they hand us this pretext which is used to pacify us. The administration gives us a platter that was suppose to be filled with ham, but they left us with the few pieces and stole the bones and all the fat right from under our nose.

What they claim they are doing should have already been in place. How is someone going to get happy over a so-called act of kindness at your school when the kindness is a disguise for guilty devils.

This reminds me of when Mr. Malcolm X told the audience in his second speech to OAAU rally on July 5, 196, that "so much hullaballoo was being made over this new civil rights legislation ..." Some might say it was great the United States finally passed the civil rights bill, but the point is those who helped build this country shouldn't have to wait for a civil rights bill to be treated well in one's own country. It's like someone giving you the right to use the bathroom in your own home.

Why should the African-American, Latino, Asian American and Native American community or anyone else have to wait to be treated with respect and decency in our own school?

The administration is probably patting themselves on the back saying we gave them what they wanted, they should be happy. Well good God, we have made some progress and they think they have done something good, when it should have already been in effect.

The real power on this campus belongs in the hands of the students not the administrators. The administrators are simply trustees or representatives for the students. They are in positions of privilege not positions of right. It is their obligation and duty to serve the campus community in an effective capacity. Some of our administrators earn very good pay in their positions, but I don't think that their performance deserves such high rewards. If our tuition and tax dollars are going to pay those people, then we the students should damn-well make sure they earn every last red penny. When they cannot perform up to par or decide to become involved in sabbotage, then someone needs to take the Amtrack.

GOMES

This time around if promises are not totally carried through [which has been the case through the annals of this university] it will not only be the university's fault but our fault as well. The protesting might be over, but that does not mean we just forget about last semester.

When you check your luggage in at the airport, you check it all the way through. That means that the ALANA community must follow all the way through. We cannot just sit back and wait for a few years to pass and then start from ground zero again. This cyclical process becomes very sickly after awhile. It becomes tiresome because so many before us have fought for the same things. It is like watching the same video over four-hundred times over a three-hundred year period. We can't just stand up and clap our hands when some ominous event happens, but rather keep everything in check everyday.

The students pay tuition yearly and it increases every semester. At the same time the tuition increases, the services are diminishing, which is very ironic. We are not getting our money's worth. The services should be increasing and getting better. In fact ALANA students must demand more money and put it into programs like CCEBMS, BCP, and UALRC instead of idily watching the funding for these programs levelled or decreased. It could lead to the same kind of espionage that took place with Upward Bound. (In fact, the grapevine says all the money allotted for such programs have not been put into these programs, but that is a whole other story.)

A few weeks ago, I condemned the Uncle Toms over in the big house and the phony allies. This week I would like to remember those from ALANA community and allies who have been fighting with us, for us and before us. They have been committed before some of us were born. I am sure that some of them could be getting much more money at other institutions, but yet they have stayed with us. I looked at some of their faces last semester during the meeting with the chancellor and I could see their frustration. They saw this same scenario many times before.

We must remember where the struggle began and where we are going. Although some of us were not here in the sixties, never had a dog put on us or a hose knocked across our head because we were protesting non-violently for our rights, we must remember those who did. Because of those who bore the pain we are fortunate enough to be here today. They advanced us up the mountain top, although the peak seems like it's way up in the sky. They were strong, so we should remain strong

We are not always going to see eye to eye on everything within the ALANA community because we are human. Some of us may not like one another, but that doesn't mean we can't work together. Those who want to work together will work together and those who don't want to become involved, we will leave them in the woods. Each branch of the ALANA community needs to clean out their individual houses and then we can clean out the whole house together. We have got to concentrate on our similarities, learn from the differences and discard the ignorances and stereotypes we have learned. We don't need to be ignorant toward each other or stereotype one another because others have already done this for the ALANA community.

By the year 2,000 our numbers will have increased greatly. Our children will have to live together. It is no longer simply a Black and White thing, as it has been portrayed throughout history. It's an everybody's thing. They wanted it to be a Black and White thing because everybody else was suppose to melt into the pot, but now we are all sprouting from the salad. We must walk together in order to become all the more powerful.

The Long Night of the Palestinian Holocaust

DAWN. The sleepy peace is broken by 200 heavily armed Israeli soldiers entering a quiet Gaza street. Suddenly, a drag-net seals off the area, doors are broken down, women and children dragged screaming from their beds, windows smashed, and all the Palestinians hauled into the center of the street.

The men are put in a circle, bound hand and foot and blindfolded. The others watch helplessly as the Israeli forces shell for eight long hours, after which the Israeli bulldozers clear away the rubble that once was called home by 19 families and 180 persons. The families, told to "go home," wander aimlessly amid the crumbling remains of their shattered world. There have been 17 raids since the Intifada began, with countless homes demolished.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Palestinian women march through Bethlehem following Sunday church services, marking International Women's day. The sign at right reads "March 8 is a special day for the fight of Palestinian women."

Shyamala
IVATURY

DUSK. Two youths, heads swathed in black and white Kafiyahs, slip around a corner of their West Bank neighborhood. They move like cats, quickly and carefully, aware of risks though armed only with spray paint, their small hands a blur as they embroider a wall with slogans of liberation.

Suddenly, all is lost. The Israeli patrol, catching sight of the two boys, open fire with their Galil machine guns. An eleven and twelve year old, children, brothers, and Palestinians, lie dead in their own streets, shot in the back by the Israelis.

Hundreds of children have been killed by Israelis since the Intifada began.

NIGHT. The order goes out from the Prime Minister's office across the occupied territories, hundreds of Palestinians, 1,600 in all, are pulled from their homes without warning and without charges. Within hours, 415 of them are sitting on Israeli military buses, bound and blindfolded, being driven by those who occupy their country to dump them in a foreign land (also occupied by Israel).

They are taken to a barren mountain in the freezing dead of winter. There they are released and told that they have been expelled from "Eretz Israel." When they try to walk back toward their homeland they are shot at, some wounded. They are still there to this day, victims of Israeli ethnic cleansing, unable to see their land or loved ones, surviving on the charity of local Lebanese villagers, a symbol of the Palestinian experience.

Founded in 1897 by Theodar Herzl, Zionism is a political movement that emerged against the backdrop of European industrialization and the expansion of European colonial rule in Asian and Africa. There are two paradigmatic traditions of modern western thought: social enlightenment and colonial racism. The Jewish version of the latter being expressed in political Zionism.

Political Zionism purported to offer a solution to the question of anti-semitism in Europe by establishing a Jewish State through the colonialization of Palestine. The colonization entailed the transformation of Arab Palestine through the dispossession and mass transfer of the Palestinian Arab population. In 1948, the fledging settler Jewish State expelled 800,000 Palestinians, and when it expanded itself in 1967, 300,000 more. Today there are more than 3 million Palestinians who have been wrenched from their homeland, another one-in-a-half million who live in the occupied territories, the West Bank and Gaza.

The ethnic cleansing has involved the numerous massacres of Palestinian people and the raising of their villages. To illustrate, On April 9, 1948 the Revisionist Zionist National Military Organization (Irgun Tzevai Leumi) led by the future Prime Minister and Nobel Peace Prize winner Menahem Begin and the fighters for the Freedom of Israel (Lohamei Herut Israel) led by the future Prime Minister, Yitzhak Shamir attacked the unarmed and peaceful village of Deir Yain, murdering almost 300 people, including women and children.

Given the realities which characterize life for Arabs under Israeli rule, and the odious system of Israeli apartheid under which they suffer, for many people around the world, Israel has replaced South Africa as the most hideously racist and abusive colonial system in the world today.

Conditions in the Gaza Strip are so awful that they even shock visitors from Soweto. Gaza has become what amounts to be the largest concentration camp in history, with up to a million people crammed into a tiny plot of land, surrounded by barbed wire fences, check points and heavily armed troops, its people being penned inside for days, weeks or even months at a time, prevented from moving by the Israelis.

In Jerusalem, Jewish fundamentalists speak openly of demolishing the Haram-al-Sharif, and its centerpiece the Dome of the Rock Mosque, international symbol of Jerusalem itself, to construct a new Jewish temple. It was in that same Mosque in 1990 where Israeli troops opened fire on Palestinians, killing more than 15, one of the most murderous desecrations of a holy site in recent memory.

Elsewhere in the city, Palestinian homes, churches, and hospices are seized by Israelis with support of the government, which openly plans to continue to remove Palestinians, and their mosques and churches, and replace them with Israelis. Palestinians wail as the walls close in, but to no avail, this year in Jerusalem.

In Bethlehem these days, Christmas celebrations are almost always cancelled by its townsfolk, always mourning some new atrocity suffered by themselves and other Palestinians at the hands of the Israelis. Many among the 400 victims of the recent ethnic cleansing were from that little town of Bethlehem.

For the Israelis want the land without the people, Palestine without the Palestinians. Therefore everything they do is designed to get Palestinians out and bring Israelis in. That is why conditions for Palestinians under Israeli rule are such that every day is as bad as the L.A. riots, where armed settlers continuosly open fire on unarmed natives, where children are shot daily, and where ethnic cleansing is routine state policy.

Nor can Palestinians look to the Israeli Supreme Court for protection, since the court has never reversed an expulsion order, and has the unique distinction of being internationally alone in officially approving state torture.

Palestinians have also been unable to find any support from the United States, Israel's ultra-generous benefactor. Americans give Israel, a nation of less than four million people over $4 billion per year in taxpayer dollars. Ordinarily that might mean that the Americans would assert some influence.

But in this case it would seem not, since the Israelis have firebombed U.S. libraries and consular offices in Egypt, attacked a U.S. Navy ship killing many American sailors, and set up the most sinister spy network in the United States in decades. Jonathan Polard, Israel's American nuclear spy and an employee of the U.S. Navy intelligence, sent some of the most sensitive American nuclear secrets to Prime Ministers Rabin and Shamir, all in return for $4 billion a year.

Palestinians cannot look to America to pressure Israel because in this relationship, the Israeli tail wags the American dog. Israel is clearly in command of its rich old uncle.

What lies ahead for Palestinians in the hands of such a state? The situation is rapidly deteriorating, with more than 70 killed in the past few months and the age of the victims falling steadily. The new "liberal" government is proving harsher than its predecessor in every possible way, and the peace talks have produced only more Israeli atrocities.

Time is running out for the Palestinians, for as holocaust survivor Israel Shahak points out, "The key to understanding Israeli politics is Jewish racism." Interred in the Poniatowo and Bergen-Belsen Nazi concentration camps in his youth, Shahak has long been noted as a man who tells, as he puts it, "the simple truth about Jewish chauvinism in Israel," and one who dares to stand for Palestinian rights as opposed to Zionism.

Sadly, there are few people in this world with the moral fiber and fortitude of Dr. Shahak. And there are very, very few Israelis who can face the truths he tells about Zionism and Israel.

On the contrary, it seems clear that Israeli society will continue to adhere to the politics of Zionism, and that therefore, the long night of the Palestinian holocaust will continue, as less and less of that nation is left to live.

Arroz, Habichuelas y la politica nactionalista

El otro dia me estaba dando "pal" de "palos" con los "panas" cuando alguien empezò a comentar sobre la actual dictadura de nuestro ilustre presidente el Dr. Pedrito "El kkkaparra kkkid" Rosellò. En esas empezamos contemplar la diferencia entre un policia bien pagado y educado, y un soldado de la guardia nacional. Por otro lado salio un "mamao" glorificando la gran labor que realizò el Don Carlos "El Caballo" R. Barcelò, al exterminar dos terroristas rusos, perdòn quize decir Boricuas, en el Cerro Maravilla. De no se donde salio una "diesas" chicas que usan camisas de "Porto Rico Designs," y me regaòa alegando que yo solo hablo de politica. Mas, no me quedo otra que responderle "chica si todo en la vida tiene un poquito de politica envuelto." Ella se rio y me pregunto "Ya! a ver c que tienen el arroz y las habichuelas de politica?" No me quedo otra que preguntarle "ca nivel internacional ò local?"

Charles
VENATOR

A nivel internacional es obvio que el arroz blanco con habichuelas, especialmente habichuelas con sazòn, recaito y/o sofrito, individualizan a nuestra cultura ante los hot dogs y el apple pie, el escargot o el arroz chino. Apezar de que el capital gringo esta re-conceptualizando nuestra dieta, todavia hay mòs cuchifritos que "McDonalds." Ante el imperialismo gringo, todavia hasta el mòs estadista se "espeta" su buen platito de arroz y habichuelas, con tostones y un bistecito con cebollitas guisadas.

Pero ante todo, a pezar de que estos apetitos contribuyen a la re-interacion de nuestra independencia cultural, a un podemos observar el elemento de contingencia politica domestica multicultural, racial y etnica.

Ella se rio y me pregunto c como? Mas no me quedo otra que preguntarle c de que color es el arroz en su estado natural? Eso de "purificar o limpiar" el arroz y quitarle los nutrients era cosas de come cacas. Pero ante nada esp de separar el arroz blanco de las habichuelas colorèdas, era cusa de ricos, ya que los pobres Sabian comer arroz con habichuelas. Pero al igual que los mòs perdios tambien mezclan el arroz y las habichuelas a la hora de las "verdò."

En fin la comida al igual que el idioma y otras asociancione de simbolos, tiene el potencial de comunicarnos unas ideologias morales de forma subliminal. Un gobierno que logre privatizar el elemento publico de estado, podria tener el potencial de educar y controlar un pueblo.

De esta manera "El kkkaparra kkkid, El Caballo y el resto de la Gusanera," tienen el potencial de destruir nuestra identidad y redefinir nuestros gustos a la larga. NO!

Flood waters cause troubles in the Bay State

By JEFF DONN
Associated Press

Winter's snows were still making springtime woes Tuesday across Massachusetts as homeowners bailed basements, crews fixed washouts, and a small number of evacuees waited to reclaim flooded homes.

High waters in Brighton washed away a retaining wall, crushing several cars beneath it, authorities said. But no injuries were reported.

Mud caked gravel roads in Blandford and some other Berkshire Mountain communities remained closed.

"We've got a lot of people leaving cars, and they're walking to their houses," said Robert Deane, chief selectman in Blandford. He said he had never seen the roads so bad in his 20 years in town.

Workers were mopping up at the Blandford Elementary School, which was closed for the second day with 1 1/2 feet of water in the basement. But school officials said they would reopen Wednesday.

"At the elementary school level, anything that disturbs their schedule gets them upset. I think they'll be happy." Business Manager Terry Sears said of the school's 100 pupils.

Eight evacuated residents, including a couple in their 80s, were forced to stay away from their homes in Southampton near Pequot Pond, authorities said.

In Northbridge, state officials delivered about 20,000 sandbags to a National Guard armory for fear of flooding on the Blackstone River, where up to six residents had been evacuated, said Street Superintendent Wallace Steele.

But he said the threat was abating Tuesday. "The river seems to be receding, if we don't get any more rain," he said.

But in Hadley, families in five homes off the Connecticut River worried that flood waters might engulf their homes. Highway Superintendent Michael Klimoski said officials were keeping a close watch in case evacuations were necessary.

Crews also worked there to repair a 15 foot deep washout of Honeypot Road, a residential street. Klimoski said he drove across fields late Monday to rescue a resident who hurt his ankle trying to jump across the crack.

"This is an exceptional year," he said. " Last year, there was no flooding out there."

The flooding flows from the snowmelt of this year's bad winter, the sudden spring thaw and this week's rains. Forecasters predicted an end to the rain later Tuesday, but a flood watch remained in effect in Berkshire County.

In communities across the state, work crews were cleaning clogged storm sewers. Residents were pumping or bailing out flooded basements, sometimes with help from local fire departments.

In Arlington, several feet of water flowed through the normally busy Mystic Valley Parkway.

"This is a tough situation, probably the worst we've seen in many years," said Charles Lombardi of the Massachusetts Water Resources Authority, which was helping in the parkway cleanup.

The Merrimack River swelled to threatening heights, forcing officials to activate dams in Merrimac, Franklin, Blackwater, Hopkinton and Everett.

Officials said they are avoiding releasing the water dams until the water levels drop.

Blast shakes pyramid

Two men injured in freak explosion

By ZINA HEMADY
Associated Press

CAIRO — An explosion wounded two workers today inside one of the Giza pyramids, Egypt's most famous tourist attraction. Police arrested four men at the site but later said the blast was accidental.

The 8:45 a.m. blast occurred inside Chephren, the middle of the three pyramids, where restorers have been working. Police said no tourists were hurt, though two Egyptians working on the monuments suffered undisclosed injuries.

Investigators said the explosion occurred when a flammable substance being used to clean salt from the monument's inner walls ignited from a spark.

But police, fearing another Muslim extremist attack, already had quickly arrested four men on Giza Plateau and more than 30 in Cairo, officers said.

Maj. Gen. Mohamed Thaalab, head of the tourism and antiquities police said witnesses reported hearing a loud bang at the time of the explosion.

Police said no sign of damage was evident inside or around the monument.

Muslim extremists seeking to overthrow Egypt's secular regime escalated their violence last year and started targeting foreign tourists to embarrass the government and cut off its main source of foreign currency.

Supreme Court rules to allow death penalty in Idaho case

By LAURIE ASSEO
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON—The Supreme Court, ruling in the case of a man who admitted killing as many as 40 people, today allowed Idaho to impose death sentences for murderers who showed "utter disregard for human life."

Under Idaho law, no convicted murderer can be sentenced to death unless at least one of seven aggravating factors — including "utter disregard" — is found.

Today's 7-2 decision said that aggravating factor, interpreted by the Idaho Supreme Court to mean a "coldblooded, pitiless slayer." is not too vague to be constitutional.

"The phrase 'coldblooded, pitiless slayer' refers to a killer who kills without feeling or sympathy." Justice Sandra Day O'Connor wrote for the court.

O'Connor acknowledged "the question is close," but said the phrase properly narrows the type of defendant eligible for the death penalty.

Justice Harry A. Blackmun dissented, likening the majority's logic to "nonsense upon stilts." The phrase coldblooded" is too vague to give meaningful guidance to a sentencing judge, said Blackmun, who was joined by Justice John Paul Stevens.

The ruling means the case of convicted killer Thomas Creech will go back to Idaho courts for a new sentencing trial in which the "utter disregard" factor can be used.

Creech pleaded guilty to fatally beating fellow inmate David Jensen at a state prison May 13, 1981, while Creech was serving time for three murder convictions.

Evidence indicated that Jensen provoked a fight, but that Creech continued fighting after Jensen had become helpless.

Candyman scares and Turtles kick on HSCN

By EDWARD W. HUMPHRIES
Collegian Correspondent

With studio heads waiting for mid-May to unveil their blockbuster audience-grabbers, the movies appear to have been bitten by the Spring fever bug and seem mired in the doldrums until roughly May 15. So too does HSCN. This week does not unveil any new features but rather gives you a chance to get a second glance at any films you may have missed on their first run, and gives me a chance to step on the abysmal Candyman one last time. So set the VCR, skip that last class and enjoy nature's bounty of sunshine... and have heart for brighter films are on the horizon.

Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles — Here's a great example of the "could have been, but wasn't" phenomena in films. This film could have been a great campy cult classic — but it's not. Obviously rushed into production to take advantage of the Turtles craze that hit the nation in 1990, this film exhibits weaknesses a plenty. The movie is at times too dark (and I don't mean subject matter, I mean the camera shots are so grimy you can't see a damn thing.) This is a major weakness in a film that is based on a medium bathed in bright, primary colors. The live actors, Judith Hoag and Elias Koteas, aren't memorable and the turtles' voices (featuring jailbait Corey Feldman) are annoying at best. The only thing that earns this film any shred of decency are the great costumes by the late Jim Henson's Creature Factory, but unfortunately that is not enough to recommend this dreadful film. C-

Taxi Driver — With a Martin Scorcese film you can usually expect to encounter innovative camera shots, gritty subject matter and an ingenious performance by Robert De Niro. It's all here and in a big way in Scorcese's return to his mean streets of New York. De Niro proves his bite is worse than his bark in his portrayal of NY cab driver Travis Bickle, a man who fed up with the decay of the city around him, lays down a war on the streets and within his own psyche. Scorsese directs the script by Paul Schrader with a fierceness that grabs the viewer and never lets go. Look for a cameo by the director as a demented fare De Niro contends with. Also notable are Cybil Shepard, Albert Brooks and a young Jodie Foster. A

Virgina Madsen enters the point of no return in "Candyman," airing on HSCN this week.

Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles II — It's not saying much that this sequel is superior to the 1990 original. On the heels of that film's enormous success (due to the fact that kids will see a movie multiple times in the theater), this film was rushed into production and arrived exactly one year later. Though the production values are better and the film stock is brighter than the first, it still lacks the roller-coaster ride intensity intrinsic to comic-based films. Paige Turco replaces Judith Hoag as reporter April O'Neill and seems to have a good time in the role. David Warner (Star Trek VI) is good as the scientist, although he is too preachy of the script's heavy-handed environmental message. Once again the turtle lingo is annoying and always one step behind the times, but the costumes are superb and the addition of two more evil mutants infuses some level of comic book hysterics. C+

Tootsie — Dustin Hoffman sheds his Ratso Rizzo persona for a dress in Sydney Pollack's (Out of Africa) comedy satirizing modern stereotypes and the world of soaps. Hoffman plays a beleaguered actor who cross-dresses his way to the top of daytime drama's elite and falls in love with co-star Jessica Lange. Hoffman engages in a very funny performance and Pollack lines up an impressive array of supporting characters including Bill Murray, Charles Durning and a breakthrough cameo role by Geena Davis. B+

White Men Can't Jump — Director Ron Shelton (Bull Durham) scores in this slamming basketball jam about the inside moves within the playground roundball scam arena, circa Venice Beach. Wesley Snipes and Woody Harrelson are good as two hustlers who utilize society's racial stereotypes to score money, all the while seeking an escape from their current lives. The ending is decidedly un-Hollywood and Rosie Perez heightens a role that could have been a trademark "stand by your man" Hollywood girlfriend. B+

Delicatessen — This offbeat French offering from 1992 plays like an Orwellian hybrid of Terry Gilliam's future fantasy, Brazil, and Wes Craven's shlock-horror flick The People Under the Stairs. Centering on the bizarre denizens of an apartment building above a delicatessen, this film serves up no true narrative but is an engaging voyeuristic view at the strange-goings on in a future society. From a woman whose constant attempts at suicide are thwarted to a duo of tunnel dwelling sewer inhabitants (nouveau Ninja Turtles), this film is bathed in dark humor. Though not for everyone, its worth trying out this Delicatessen. B

Rhinestone — A film teaming Dolly Parton and Sylvester Stallone. Thankfully not some studio execs April Folls gag at a buddy-movie concept, but not that promising either. This film was Stallone's first dabble in comedy (a genre which Schwarzennegar has had considerable more success in), and it proves that perhaps he should have kept the Roman numeral installments of

Backstage look at the Loud Music Festival

By ADAM GOULSTON
Collegian Staff

This is the first of a two-part series on the Loud Music Festival.

Loud Music Festival
Pearl Street, Iron Horse, Hotel Northampton
March 26-27, 1993

If I could walk a hundred miles in David White's shoes, I'd be done in half an hour with skidmarks in my wake. "I guess if I had a title, I'd be 'stage manager,'" answered White as if it was the first time he'd heard the question.

Only a few days earlier had David White been assigned the task of coordinating over 30 bands with three venues. Now on Friday, day one of the Loud Music Festival, the physical portion of White's job was just beginning. With Northampton's Pearl Street, Iron Horse and Hotel Northampton all running concerts concurrently for two consecutive days, there was potential for colossal disarray.

Already Morphine, the scheduled opening act at Iron Horse that evening had cancelled.

"Basically if we can get all the bands on stage when they're supposed to be, it'll be a success," he said. White's goal was realistic if not said in the greatest of confidence. His boyish face seldom departed with its playful grin. The pass and T-shirts were expected back from the printer sometime soon. The floor crew scuffled on as temporary security arrived looking a tad confused and looking for "Dave."

The Iron Horse assumes the facade of just another modest store front while maintaining a venue with the class of a hip cafe and the musical capacity of a room five times the size (capacity 150).

At 3:45, the Iron Horse gave no clue that it was to host an event of greater significance than a local folk act. No changes were planned save a smaller menu and the clearing of tables, the lounging management informed me.

Owner Jordy Herold sauntered casually through his establishment with little of the innocent vigor and wide eyed anticipation seen on White's face. Herold soberly view the Loud Music Festival as "a good way to consolidate the whole Northampton scene, what with the Billboard article and all the added publicity." He would also praise the creative abilities of the show's organizers, Radius Management.

Eventually an official Loud Music Festival banner would be hung behind the tiny performance shelf with a backstage entrance which doubles as an exit to the street. Eventually the help would arrive. No hurry.

"The tickets are selling apparently. They're just not selling here. Maybe it's because we usually don't sell tickets," a salesperson at Main Street Records informed me. There remained a large stack of the tickets they'd been given to sell. But rumor had it that sales had really picked up at the Northampton Box Office across in Thorne's Market.

Over my shoulder as I glanced through the box of CD singles on the counter and the salespeople priced the new Velocity Girl release, I heard one of them discussing the schedule with a customer, grieving that "all the good music's on Friday."

Pearl Street's downstairs quarters at 5:15 p.m. had taken on an air of added importance, an active bustle. Beads of sweat had become evident beneath strands of hair which had unexpectedly fallen out of place on David White's forehead. As members of Thinner wandered in and out, Cell ran an impressive soundcheck.

"I've got a good story for you, Chicken Milk had to cancel," Dave related to me. It seems the Toronto band was detained by border patrol. Apparently the b.p. doesn't take too kindly to guitars and the smuggling potential of their cases. Go figure.

Fifteen minutes later, White's legs were seen sprinting by the basement windows. An hour later, the passes and T-shirts arrived two hours late. With an engaging grin, Dave lobbed me a T-shirt and a press pass. Back to UMass to grab my earplugs.

Finding a future for Campus Man: Hollywood mogul?

Ah — the joys of spring; the snow mounds are melting, our campus walkways are filled with mud, and the rain keeps on coming down. You all know what that means folks, or don't you? It means we're just another step closer to the summer and that unavoidable job search. So flip out those lap top computers, them laser printers, and get yourself some top notch printing paper and type away because in order to be considered for a practical internship or job you'll definitely need a resume and a cover letter.

Well, for myself, trying to write a resume was just the beginning part of my job search nightmare. I sat and stared at a blank piece of paper and closed my eyes as I prayed for something to appear on that slab of finely sliced tree. Of course, not even the genie in Aladdin could help me with that. So I stared at my friend's resume as an outline for how one should be set up. I hate to tell you this but there are more styles for writing a resume than there are Swatch watches across the globe!

Al-right, so I figured out that I needed an objective. Hmmm, I wrote down Hollywood. Don't laugh. Actually, stop laughing! Hey, if your an aspiring Hollywood mogul what else are you suppose to say? I thought about writing down for my objective that I wanted to take Tori Spelling for my bride so she and I can be the hottest Hollywood Couple since Madonna and Sean. I would have even gone on to say that my goal is to become the most famous man throughout the entertainment industry and to become what is known on the other side of the continent as a hyphenate; an actor-director-writer-producer-model-agent-mogul-provocateur. And yes, I am serious.

However, at this point I was getting absolutely nowhere (Hey what a campaign title for Absolut Mickey Rourke: Absolut Nowhere!). Come on, anyone who's anyone in Hollywood as well as myself knows that it's not what you know, it's who you know. This also extends to who your parents are and definitely who you sleep with. So what's a Beverly Hills wanna-be to do?

Anyhow this is where my good friend Diana comes in to save the day like Wonderwoman. Hey, and she even has the same first name as the famed Diana Prince who was the beautiful superpower. So, Diana sits me down and starts hysterically laughing at my objective. What did I know, it was my first try at writing a resume and I haven't even had the time to shlep to the Mather Career Center for some assistance. Oy Vey!

Diana made me erase that whole shpeel about Tori Spelling and conquering Tinsletown. And here is where my resume begins to take shape, kind of like Cher's body, minus the plastic surgery.

Adam Scott
ROBERTS

"D" helped me make a list of my experience. Resume's are kind of an art form in itself because you can make everything sound more snazzy than it may actually be in reality. So, we can say that we are all artists at this creative stage. So being the creative Campus Man that I am, I figured I could include in my resume my great job at the Chestnut Hill Cinema's in Newton while being creative in describing what it was that I did there.

Diana helped me word what it was that I wanted to say. I know, it's so ironic that a writer needs help writing anything, but come on, even Campus Man isn't perfect (but pretty darn close!). We came up with the wording to say: Operated concession stand and Box Office. Then I added in: helped organize (remember always, always, use action verbs in your descriptions) and coordinate corporate and private screenings and openings. It was at this point I thought I should mention that I was an extra in Housesitter and A League of Their Own, but I guess this doesn't look good unless I'm applying for an acting job — then again a resume is not what gets you an acting job! Nuff said.

The best thing I had to write down for experience was The Massachusetts Daily Collegian. It was here that I really got to splurge about doing numerous articles as well as for mentioning (action verb) Implementing a weekly column called Campus Man.

For activities I found a few things to fill that space. My favorite was: Nominated President of my Fraternity. Rewind. How could I forget? I'm not in one! But if I was it would have looked nice. And for all the Greeks, especially my friend Larry, thinking I'm a greek basher, I'm so not. It's just a little joke — Just Deal! And yes, I'll refrain in the future. Hey, look forward to the Adam Scott Roberts interview with a fraternity man on Greek Life (honestly!). However, if you are in a house and hold a position mention it in your resume, it can't hurt, it can only help. Can anyone say: connections?

The next step is to print your resume on some nice paper. And remember to reread your resume at least 1000 times, I guarantee you'll keep finding errors. I borrowed over at least 60 pieces of paper from my friend Lori until I got my resume just right. And just when I thought it was perfect I noticed that I had a typo.

The final part of this whole job search fiasco is the cover letter. Like, the resume isn't enough! I followed the cover letter format that Diana told me to and I began to type away. At this point, you'll find yourself emotionally drained from this writing experience. Maybe you all should ask for junior writing credits just for doing your real resume and cover letter. I know the thought is still lingering inside my mind.

Finally, the resume and the cover letter are complete. Make sure you keep up the standards by using matching color paper as the resume for your cover letter or paper of similar quality. Gee, maybe I should be a counselor at the Mather Career Center?

Now, once you have signed, sealed, and delivered your resume and cover letter you can relax, take a break, and head on uptown. Just when you thought your nightmare was over you'll have to wait out and weather the storm because the waiting process may be the most nerve racking part of the whole job search. Then again, if you don't get the job, there's always summer camp!

Adam Scott Roberts, a future Oscar Award recipient, is a Collegian columnist.

Rambo/Rocky coming. Though the sight of Stallone adorned in rhinestone, crooning country alongside Parton is worth some unintentional laughs, this film largely should remain as dead as Elvis. D+

Candyman — This uneven 1992 thriller based upon a short story by horror novelist Clive Barker, has a good premise but due to an uninspired script, gets lost and becomes nothing more than a standard slasher film. The plot involves the research of a college grad student (Virginia Madsen) into the field of urban folklore, where she unknowingly awakens the ire of an inner city phantom, Candyman. Before the film is drenched in buckets of blood, the story suprisingly shows some promise. Unfortunately too many questions linger and before long the film decides to follow in the footsteps of psychos past adding nothing new to that ailing genre. D+

A blast from the past: Jethro Tull's Aqualung

By RACHEL D. MEDANIC
Collegian Staff

Welcome back to the past. In 1973, the band Jethro Tull put out a concept album. They called it Aqualung.

Wait a minute! 1973! Hey, is this article filler? No, it's not. It was an idea.

What is an aqualung? Based on the common use of the term to describe the oxygen tank and the mouthpiece for breathing used in scuba diving, aqualung is a homeless man who dies when his lungs fill up with fluid from the cold, hence, aqualung.

The song uses the metaphor to describe the man's situation and subsequent death: "An old man wandrin' lonely/Taking time the only way he knows./Leg hurtin' bad/He bends to pick a dogend [cigarette butt]/He goes down to the beg and warms his feet/Do you still remember/December's foggy freeze/And the ice that clings onto your beard was screaming agony/When you snatch your rattling last breath/With deep sea diver's sounds/And the flowers bloom like madness in the spring."

The album stabs in two parts, at societal injustices (the existence of economic classes-part I Aqualung) created by cultural worship of wealth (part II My God) within the framework of religious criticism. The opening songs, "Aqualung," "Cross-Eyed Mary" and "Cheap Day Return" are portraits of the poor.

The progression continues to a middle-class boy ("Mother Goose") and then to impressionistic sketches of a middle-class couple ("Wond'ring Aloud, Up To Me"). The wealthy are presented metaphorically through criticism of religion in ("My God, Hymn 43") and blatantly ("Slipstream," "Locomotive Breath," "Wind-Up").

The album's liner notes open with the idea that man created God as a convenient explanation for all things:

"And on the seventh millionth day Man rested and did lean heavily on his God and saw that it was good/And Man formed Aqualung of the dust of the ground/and a host of others likened unto his kind/And these lesser men were cast into the void/And Man became the God that he had created/But the Spirit that did cause man to create his God lived on within all men: even within Aqualung/And man saw it not./But for Christ's sake, he'd better start looking."

The album can be characterized as rock with tidbits of Rachmaninoffish intensity, acoustic guitar folk meanders and an ornamentation mixture of flute, mellotron and descant and alto recorder. Particularly notable is the "scatsong" sound of Anderson's flute combined with Gregorian chant simulations in track 7 ("My God") which fiercely criticizes God as man's means of justification and the religious practices related to the crucifix and to God's image. In addition, Locomotive Breath begins as contemporary classical/piano and transits boldly to an engaging percussion/guitar/flute.

Jethro Tull is a band that took their name from a 19th century agricultural inventor in England. One of the things that distinguished the band was that their lead singer, Ian Anderson was a flautist whose sound lent something unusual to their sound.

In an interview once, Anderson boasted JT's uniqueness because they were the only band with a flute. When the interviewer challenged by naming Steve Winwood of Traffic, Anderson and his ego stumbled. But don't worry, his ego doesn't come through quite that strongly on the album; it isn't live.

It would not be unreasonable to speculate that the moral is that we should not only see "the aqualung" (new use), the men downstairs on the financial scale, but see what created them. Perhaps they inspired JT to make such a philosophical album.

rassing setback the Senate had dealt to Clinton's jobs bill, another important piece of the president's recovery economic program. The $16.3 billion measure would provide money for mass transit summer jobs.

In a 52-48 vote, the Senate reversed itself and killed a Republican amendment trimming $104 million from the bill. Lawmakers had given the GOP provision preliminary approval on a 48-44 vote the night before.

The tally showed that the chamber's majority Democrats will probably be able to keep enough of their 57 members together to muscle the jobs measure through the Senate largely intact.

Hai and Nepal.

Jean Muy, a senior and choreographer of the fashion show, said she became involved With AASA because of the collective spirit of its members.

"[AASA] supports Asian/Asian-American students. There's a continuity from the past to present members. Asian Night is an awareness of differences and has a unifying theme... It brings people together," Muy said.

The play "Dedicated to Vincent Chin" dramatically recreated the controversial death of a Chinese student. This play, coupled with the portrayal of issues that confront Asian/Asian-Americans in their daily lives attempted to send the message directly to those who may not have understood the plight and obstacles still facing Asian and Asian-American students on this campus and across the nation.

William Tang, a sophomore also involved in the planning of Asian Night and a strong supporter of raising campus awareness of issues affecting Asian/Asian-American students, said he believes that AASA has the potential and has laid the groundwork necessary to address students concerns.

"I joined (AASA) mainly because it provided a stepping stone, and I was able to come into contact with other students, it afforded me the opportunity to help build a better community." Tang said. "Asian Night was a celebration of Asian heritage and culture and community."

THE BEACH IS OPEN — People gather on the steps beside the Student Union, as they enjoy the spring sunshine. Unfortunately, a huge mound of snow serves as a reminder that winter may not be over quite yet.

The Unbearable Lightness of Being

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Romance is happy, if not particularly exciting. Do not give up security. Pay attention to loves one's desires. Discuss an idea with your associates.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Just as you are about to give up, the answers begin to come. Longtime friends are your biggest boosters. A flirtation could turn out to be the real thing. Dine in intimate surroundings.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): This is a time for building a solid base and collecting what is owed you. New social contacts could lead to more business. Higher-ups give your job performance high marks. Press ahead.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Profits come from several sources. Think big and you will accomplish great things. An influential person wants to be on your team. Nurture this relationship with considerate gestures.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Picking up the check at lunch or dinner goes a long way toward impressing an associate. Your ESP is accurate; what you think, you know, you do! Romance sizzles later today.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Welcome news boosts your spirits. A business deal nears the turning point. Apply common sense to every move you make. Someone makes an unusual request. Be gracious.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Romance looks promising for all who are young at heart. If searching for financial solutions, consult an expert. You hard work and dedication will soon bring greater rewards.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Your faith in someone will be richly rewarded. Stand up for your principles. A co-worker needs your input. Withhold nothing. Go all out to impress those who count.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): You see an old friend in a new light. Romance is possible. Your good taste impresses someone influential. A financial question will be answered to your satisfaction.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Sit down with a loves one and talk calmly; new rapport is possible. Complete pending projects before launching more. Heavy spending is taboo.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A depressing situation is strictly temporary. Keep your chin up! Your productivity rises when you focus on one project at a time. Romance looks better than ever.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Changing your attitude toward a project works to your advantage. A financial choice must be made without further delay. Get busy! Other people will applaud your initiative.

overview of resources necessary to find help," said Cowen. "Reduced funding would prevent some clients from receiving the help which is available to them and that would be pretty unfortunate."

Last year, First Call For Help provided answers and referrals for food, shelter, fuel assistance, medical care, support groups, therapists, and more to over 12,000 people. So far in 1993, many callers report problems paying rent, the end of unemployment benefits, loss of health insurance, utility shutoffs and the need for emergency food.

Despite this influx of calls and the change in technology over the last decade, First Call remains committed to maintaining a personal touch at all times.

"Electronic voice mail is no substitute for a real person answering the phones," said Cowen. "When someone calls with a problem, we want to make sure that someone is there to answer whatever question they have."

First Call provides most of its information over the phone but the agency also offers help in a variety of ways: in person for walk-in clients and through the agency publication, "All the Help You Can Get." Known as the "big red book," this publication is widely used by other social agencies, churches, and charitable organizations to locate resources for their clients.

"We work with organizations like the AIDS task force, Hampshire Youth 2000, the Council of Social Agencies and the Human Services Task Force," said Cowen. "In each case, we simplify their work by lending our expertise to their service coordination efforts.

"First Call tries to find out which needs of Hampshire County residents aren't being met and then fill those needs accordingly," she said. "The agency is a multipurpose, one-stop information center."

professionals who work with youth to bring this area of concern to their attention, according to Genasci.

The other programs in PFLAG include a public education program which the federation hopes will educate the general public about homosexuality. PFLAG also has a Family Aids Support Network.

"Our belief is that once people are properly educated on the topic, they can free themselves up to thoroughly enjoy and participate with members of the GLB community and open up our society to be affirming of all persons regardless of orientation," Genasci said.

Genasci and her husband James became involved with the GLB community in 1982 when their son came out. They did not know about PFLAG at the time, so they read all the literature they could find. In 1986 the Genasci's started a chapter in Amherst modeled after the Hartford chapter they had originally attended.

"I encourage other families to learn all they can about homosexuality and support family members and their friends," Genasci said.

She said the PFLAG group is very diverse and includes parents, spouses, siblings, children, friends and sexual minorities. She also said it is not just a group for parents.

Genasci said she is a retired schoolteacher and a full- time volunteer. She said she spends some time in Washington lobbying for positive change.

John Keats, Dick Vitale end the post-NCAA blues

Jonathan
GANGI

My professor for Major British Writers is rambling on about the private love life of poet John Keats and it is taking all of my concentration just to hold up my chin and eyelids, when suddenly I am hit with a vision. More like a divine inspiration from above.

I am sitting in a black room. To my right, a light glares on me and I can make out the lens of a camera pointed on me. The camera moves then to the man sitting across from me and light shines off his glossy head. As he begins to speak, his hands start to flail and his head wobbles back and forth, shaking his lazy eye. The image becomes clearer and it seems to be, . . . no it is!

Dick Vitale. A smile stretches his entire face, which gets redder with each word. The camera swings back to me.

ME: Let's talk about the UMass Minutemen.

DICK: Oh Jon, don't get me started!

DICK: Everybody thought the loss of Harper Williams and Tony Barbee would be too devastating. They thought that it would take a while for the incoming class to be effective.

His face starts to light up again.

DICK: But I warned 'em, 'Watch out, these kids have talent with a capital T, baby.!'

ME: How about Lou Roe?

DICK: How 'bout TV Lou Roe? Awesome baby! Let me tell ya, this kid can flat out play. Twelve boards a game? You gotta be kiddin' me! The A-10 Player of the Year has strength, agility, quickness, and a 10 foot J. What else do you want? But do you know what else he's got, Jon? He's got the NBA scouts drooling over him!

ME: Donta Bright.

DICK: Rick Ayers is wipin' his eyes out in Ohio this very moment, saying, 'Oh, I coulda had him!' This kid is a P.T.Per, a Prime Time Performer. The former McDonald's All-American has come roaring back after sitting out last year. Boy can he finish. With Donta in the lineup, the future of UMass is nothing but Bright!

ME: Marcus Camby.

DICK: D.D. baby, Diaper Dandy. A-10 Freshman of the Year hands down. John Calipari has finally filled his need for a legit big man. Marcus has the skills of a guard, and the shot blocking ability of a man outta Georgetown, currently residing in Charlotte, North Carolina — that's right, Mr. Mourning. See ya later Vin Baker, hello Marcus Camby!

ME: Tyrone Weeks.

DICK: I love this kid, Jonny. Three months ago evrybody said "Tyrone who?" Now he's proven he shoulda been alongside his high school rival Rasheed Wallace in the McDonald's All American game last year. He lit Temple up for 24 points in the Mullins Center.

ME: Dick, we're runnin' a bit short on time. How far will the Minutemen go?

DICK: Sky's the limit, baby. Throw in Edgar Padilla, the A-10 steal leader and you got the best class of newcomers since the Fab Five of Michigan. And I'll challenge anyone to find a better frontline than Roe, Camby and Bright.

He shakes his head.

Scott's shots unveils the Cravat King

Does John Calipari's contract extension include the UMass chancellorship? Might not be a bad idea, he did wonders for the hoop team.

Of course, I hear this guy David Scott has the edge on the Road to Whitmore.

• Either the new Patriots' logo goes, or I sit in the parking lot for the entire home opener. No, I did that last year. Okay, this year I'll stage a sit-in at the fifty. Sign-ups on the Student Union steps.

The new, aerodynamic, sleek, contoured Patriot Punk is a disgrace. Bring back the cartoon dude.

• It's good to see that Cal got a contract extension, but in reality what can that mean? If Cal wants to bolt, he bolts. Now is not the time however, especially with the Camby Man coming in next year. Besides, he's still never taken home the Cravat King title (see below).

David
SCOTT

• Bobby Cremins will be teaching a new class at Georgia Tech next year called, "Contract Negotiations, The Cremins Way."

• Say a prayer for Beulaville, North Carolina's Bobby Shivar. Shivar, a 45 year old pipefitter, has a chance at $1 million on Sunday, if he can hit a college three-pointer during halftime of the NCAA All-Star game (Harper Williams will be there). One chance. Tons of pressure. Bird would hit it, but will Shivar?

• Someone tell Mike Jarvis to stay at George Washington, if for no other reason than to see Yinka become a player.

• Remember when UMass had spring sports? Lorden Field should be ready for play come August . . . of 1998.

• Now, for the really important awards show of the week. It's time once again to crown the Cravat King for 1992-93. The votes have been tabulated and until this very moment have been sealed in a jar, next to the pickled eggs, on the counter at the Montague Inn. We thank the accounting firm of Ed and Tina for their diligent work - and cold beer.

First, the Lifetime Achievement Award for Best Neckwear Throughout an Entire Career. The Golden Tie goes to — Mr. Milton Cole of the Hampshire Gazette, a man who has never seen a tie that didn't match well with mustard.

The award has been re-named in Cole's honor to the Milt-Tie.

In what was the closest vote in the 66-year history of the contest, the Cravat King cravat will again rest firmly, and securely around MY neck. (You want to win an award, start your own contest, jerky.)

It would be a gross oversight, if we didn't mention the silk Marty Dobrow, also of the fashion conscious Gazette, wore in Syracuse. It was his "wedding tie," and what a tie it was, Mar-Tie.

• Women's soccer coach and all-around good guy, Jim Rudy has made it to the Rollins College Hall of Fame. We know not what this actually means, but any one in the Hall of Fame has a place in this space.

• Ed Pinckney would be a nice addition to this year's Celtics team. Easy Ed really could have established himself this year.

• How's this for marketing? The Denver Nuggets have a plan by which fans can exchange a working, unloaded handgun for two tickets to an upcoming game. I'll guess a loaded gun gets four tickets, or perhaps an entire section.

• Girl Scout cookies and March Madness. Two great tastes that taste great together.

• Mo Vaughn as American League batting champ? The MoSox, gotta love it.

• The NHL. There, a hockey reference without even the hint of sarcasm.

• Who is that Tar Heel in the Sports Information Office?

• Keep your feet in bounds and your eyes on Butch.

Home lacrosse game postponed

Gorillas matchup versus Brown to take place May 5

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

Tomorrow's University of Massachsuetts men's lacrosse home opener against Brown has officialy been postponed to May 5 due to unplayable field conditions at Richard F. Garber Field, UMass coach Ted Garber said yesterday.

Garber said Brown coach Peter Lasagna wanted to get the game in this week, but the fact that UMass has only five home games and did not want to give one away figured heavy in the decision to postpone the contest rather than move it.

The Gorillas will have to wait until this weekend to try and improve their 1-1 record and No. 10 ranking, when they will travel to Hempstead, N.Y. to face Hofstra (Sat.) and 11th-ranked Duke (Sun.).

Garber could be seen yesterday morning at Garber Field, breaking up ice on the field's surface with a snow shovel in hopes that next week's game at Providence College may be moved to the Hill. It seems the Friars have the same problem the Gorillas do with their home turf.

"How many coaches of top ten lacrosse teams shovel their own field?" Garber said, breaking up chunks of ice near where the crease normally would be. "If you don't break up this ice it'll never melt," he said.

We're the only top 10 lacrosse team with no field to practice or play on," Garber said. "But we've gotten to be a pretty good road team."

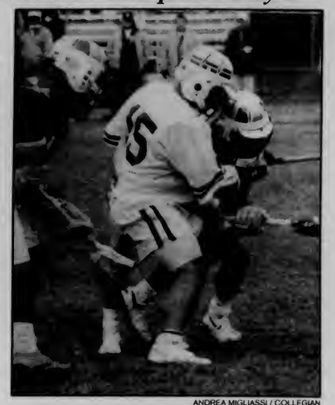
In the meantime, the Gorillas continue to improvise in the search for outside playing time. They went back to Elot yesterday — a development Garber said has built-in dangers all it's own.

"We've got some of the toughest lacrosse players in the country," Garber said. "[Long stick defender] Dennis Kelly ran into a phone poll — he never saw it. If you can survive a pick from a phone poll, you can survive anything. We should do helmet testing."

In college lacrosse this week: UMass' 25-4 thumping of St. John's was the most lopsided Division I score reported from last weekend. The worst in all of lax? Denison 29, St. Vincent 1. Ouch.

Meanwhile, Syracuse continues to underachieve against Baltimore-area teams. The highly-touted (but what's new?) Orangemen, who lost to Loyola last week 13-12, beat 12th-ranked Towson State 15-8. The only ranked team the Orange have beaten this year is No. 17 Yale. Don't bet on many more losses, however: most of SU's remaining games are at the Carrier Dome, where they never lose.

In New England, Brown made a case for the North by beating Loyola 13-12. A UMass win over Brown this week might have propelled the Gorillas as high as fifth. As it stands now, the Gorillas will have to face the Bruins the same week they play Syracuse and No. 9 Army (5-0).



ANDREA MIGLIASSI / COLLEGIAN
The University of Massachusetts lacrosse team will not play Brown this Wednesday, but will travel and take on Hofstra and Duke this weekend.

Other future UMass opponents also claimed victories as Yale beat Cornell 11-8, Duke walloped Villanova 17-5 and Hofstra wailed on Providence 19-6. Defending NCAA champion Princeton beat intra-state rival Rutgers 14-7.

UMass stats: To absolutely no one's surprise, All-American attacker Mark Millon leads the Gorillas with 8 goals and 5 assists (13 points). Wes Depp has 6 goals, while Greg Kline leads all Gorillas with 6 assists.

The most impressive statistic to the Gorillas' credit, however, has to be their face-off winning percentage, which is largely a credit to the play of face-off specialist Sam Joseph. Joseph won 16 of 23 face-offs against Virginia and the Gorillas have won 60 percent of all face-offs taken in two games (34-of-56).

Neely finally gets sweet revenge, NHL looks at league realignment

Who is the most hated player in the NHL? Any hockey fan from anywhere other than Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, will say Ulf Samuelsson.

When Ulf hit Cam Neely with an illegal leg check that put Neely out of action for the better part of two seasons, Bruins fans called for Ulf's head on a plate. Throughout the NHL, fans held their breathes to see if Neely would return to get a chance at vindication.

Well Cam is back, and the long awaited confrontation finally occurred Saturday, and it didn't take long for him to greet Ulf. With the puck behind the Penguin net, and Samuelsson chasing it, Neely delivered a punishing hit on the Pittsburgh defenseman. The Garden crowd gave Neely a standing ovation.

Matt
VAUTOUR

Before the game, despite the obvious animosity, Neely said he wouldn't start a fight, but to the delight of the Garden crowd, he didn't have to. True to his reputation, Samuelsson provided the cheap shot. Ulf punched Neely in the back of the head, and spent the next thirty seconds acting as Neely's punching bag. With one hand Cam pulled Ulf's shirt over his head and landed punches with the other. The linesmen stepped in to break it up, but Neely slipped free to land two more blows. Revenge was sweet in the hearts of Bruins fans. With the possibility of an upcoming playoff matchup, the Neely/Samuelsson war is far from over.

Around the NHL:

I'd like to tip my hat to the landlord of the Met Center in Minnesota. Despite offers from local businesses to pay to keep the North Stars in the the Twin Cities, owner Norm Greedy (Green) is moving the team to Dallas. The snubbed Met Center management has told Green that the North Stars have to be out of the Met Center by midnight after their last game. Green was also warned not to try to make off with the zamboni.

With the additions of two new franchises next year, commisioner Gary Bettman has proposed to realign the NHL's divisions.

The proposal has Pittsburgh joining the current Adams in the Northeast Division, which would make it the toughest division in the NHL. The remainder of Patrick would be joined by the Miami(the working name is the Panthers) franchise, and the Tampa Bay Lightning.

The Norris Divison would be joined by the improving Winnipeg Jets to make up the Central Division. This will be the only division not to include an expansion team, creating an all out battle for the division title. The West Division will be made up of the Smythe Division minus Winnipeg and the addition of the Not So Mighty Ducks.

The playoffs would also be restructured to the format current ly used by the NBA. The team with the best record in the conference plays the team with the eighth best record. This will eliminate divisional playoffs and hopefully end the shots from the critics of the system.

When Pat LaFontaine netted his 50th goal on Sunday, he became the tenth player in the league to score fifty goals. This ties the record set in 1981-1982 for the most 50-goal scorers in a season. With Mark Recchi, Pierre Turgeon and a host of others on the brink of hitting the half century mark, the record will be broken shortly.

Teemu Selanne has long since eclipsed the record for goals by a rookie. Russian superstar Alexander Mogilney, who leads the NHL with 72 goals has an outside shot at breaking Wayne Gretzky's record of 91 goals in a season. 1992-1993: The Year of the Live Puck.

If you haven't read Leigh Montville's story on Don Cherry in last week's Sports Illustrated, get a copy. It's a must read for all hockey fans.

I'd like to respond to the charges that I'm a biased Bruins fan. Those allegations are 100 percent true. But so are half the hockey fans on this campus, so deal with it.

M. Morrissey bites the big one, Oh well

By Associated Press

AMHERST — In an ironic turn of events, public officials confirm a man is dead by terrorist action, but cannot figure out who is responsible.

In a horrific, flaming explosion, Collegian editorial columnist Michael Morrissey was instantly killed last night by a bomb blast in his dorm room, authorities said.

Morrissey apparently was studying at 10:58 p.m. when a plastic explosive, placed in his MicroFridge, detonated, wiping out half a floor in Brett House. According to police and fire officials, Morrissey was killed by the blast immediately.

At press time, seventeen groups have claimed responsibility for the bombing. Among them are the Tree Huggers Club of America, the Atheist Group of UMass and the National Association for the Advancement of Oppressed, Discriminated and Generally Put Down Peoples. Officials were not able to comment on the bombing.

Morrissey was remembered as an ascerbic individual who seemed to enjoy arousing the liberal faction of the University.

"I won't miss him one bit, to be honest, I'm happy he got smoked," said chancellor Dick O'Brien. "I was waiting for the Trustees to give me a going away present, but this is everything I could have asked for and more."

"We're holding a celebration rally at the Student Union Steps for all those willing to cheer Morrissey's horrible death," said Jan Smith-Kline, presidentess of the Double-Namers Club at the University. "We will be holding a self-immolation ceremony to recognize the death of this fascist, racist person."

Authorities speculated that Morrissey, who in the past had advocated a 200-foot wall on the United States-Mexican border, condemned homosexual lifestyles and generally had raised a ruckus, finally went too far. Sources close to the investigation stated that Morrissey had planned to write an editorial advocating the destruction of the Brazilian rain forest.

"Think about it, there will be plenty of room for all those freakin' homeless people if we burn the rain forests and make condos out of them," the article stated. "Besides, with time-share capabilities, we can get those bums to work for their homes."

Although Morrissey's body was not found, authorities were having a difficult time rounding up volunteers for the excavation.

"Fuck him," said Jose O'Connell, a floormate of Morrissey's. "I couldn't give a shit whether they ever find his punk ass."

Sidd Finch, resident director of Morrissey's dorm, gave a written statement to the police.

"While I am usually shocked and saddened by the loss of human life, I am more worried about when my floor will be fixed," said Finch. "You know Whitmore; I'll be on Social Security by the time they replace that huge hole in the building."

According to UMass officials, Morrissey opened his MicroFridge door at 10:58 p.m. Wednesday night, detonating the bomb.

Students rally, takeover Hatch

Radicals take to streets to protest something or other

By MARKY MARK
and MICHELLE BALLISTIC

STUDENT UNION STEPS (where else?) — Almost 500 students, joined by STUPID department faculty, went off on the U.S racist, sexist and homophobic capitalists and generally oppressive and pretty much nasty system, yesterday to protest before taking over the Hatch bar.

"Those bastards can go fuck themselves as far as I'm concerned," said 10-year graduate student Emily I'ssickofit. "Dammit."

Carrying a sign with the rally's slogan, "Whatever it is, burn it," Dr. Neutopia, another 10-year graduate student with too much time on her hands, said she came to the rally to support her comrades in protesting stuff, whatever it is. She could not pinpiont, however, what it was exactly that made everyone so fuckin' pissed off.

"I'm sure it's a good reason though, whatever it is," she said.

Protesters sang songs, held hands, and attempted to burn several flame retardent flags.

"Burn, dammit, burn!" chanted the crowd just before a freak rainstorm extinguished the flames and drove all 500 inside to the Hatch bar.

There in the bar, protest leaders issued demands for the bartender to denounce the United States and all it stands for as well as give them free nachos.

"Uh, can I see all yer IDs?" asked Hatch Bouncer Otta Myface.

Negotiators were brought in from Whitmore to help facilitate a peaceful resolution to the takeover. UMass officials said they weren't sure what it was that upset the occupiers or even if the occupiers knew themselves.

"What ever their demands are, I'm sure we can give in to them," said Assitant Dean of Take-overs Walter Walkalloverme.

Chancellor Richard O'Brien said he did not know what they were talking about but asked whether they wanted the money in large or small bills.

"Are they talkin' big bills or small bills?" said Dick. "Where's my gin and tonic?"

Self-appointed spokesperson for the protesters Ivegotta Bigego said he hoped the new president and U.S. Congress will be forthcoming and wicked generous in resolving the current crisis.

"If I were in charge none of this would have ever happened," he said. "This is a people's revolution, the real people in America, not those other people, they're not people. This country's gotta' be run right — by me!"

We have a problem here," said director of Your Humanity Ant Pringle. "This is some painful stuff that needs to be put behind us before the healing process can begin."

Dick crushes coup, has vice-chancellor 'nixed'

By NEVHA RITTEN

In a bold turn of events Chancellor Richard O'Brien halted a bloody coup d'etat by suspending the University of Massachusetts' Constitution, ruling by decree.

Following what is believed to be an attempted administrative coup, O'Brien with the help of Chief of UMass police, Jack Luippold arrested and banished several Vice-Chancellors and Deans.

"I had to do what I had to do, nothing will stop the British Empire, where's my Tom Collins" said O'Brien from the Chancellor's mansion.

Vice-Chancellor Thomas Robinson is believed to be the leader of the failed coup. He has not been seen since O'Brien instated martial rule over the campus.

"Tommy was a friend of mine, lets just say he sleeps with the kippers."

O'Brien, who was scheduled to leave office this year, said he would stay on as Chancellor "forever" and promised instability and mass confusion.

"Things will continue as usual, long live the Queen."

O'Brien, who was originally an administrator from Oxford University in England, was fired when he was caught sleeping during a Royal Banquet.

O'Brien ended his press conference by saying he would do his best to make life miserable on campus.

Officials end campus diddling

By WILLIE B. SLAPPIN'IT
Collygian Staff

The Collygian's investigative I-Team has uncovered some rather startling news concerning violations of student's civil liberties here on campus. In a phone call placed to this reporter late last evening a source identifying itself as "Lou Briderm" made the allegations that high ranking university officials would soon be implementing a ban against self stimulation in the dorms.

Briderm, speaking in a hushed whisper, said that it was part of a grand scheme spearheaded by the administration to completely wipe out any last remnants of enjoyment for students who are trapped within the concrete prisons we call "dormitories".

"It's just gotten completely out of hand" said Briderm. "First they took the cigarrettes. Then they took the kegs. Then the bastards went and made the crappers all single sex. And now they want to take this away too? They must be stopped before it's too late!"

When I called the offices of Vice-Chancellor Harry Palms to verify the rumors Palms seemed irritated and chaffed by my probing. Palms reported to the I-Team that there was indeed a plan to rub out self-stimulation and that it would be taking effect immediately.

"It has recently come to our attention that often times when these students are 'doing it' they are having much too much a good time" reported Palms. "And as you know, the university has always been dead set against the students enjoying themselves. We tried to create a way in which to govern what we call, "The Time of Personal Sin", and had even planned to implement an honesty-policy. But after careful examination we realized that this could not be fairly enforced due to the fact that most women lie about it. So instead we chose to simply ban the whole thing. We're here to learn, not to fondle damn it!"

Palms' extinction plan is divided into two groups separating males and females. The male plan calls for the removal of; soaps, hand cremes and any other lubricants from University stores along with the removal of sexy underwear ads from the Sears Sunday supplement. The report went further to call on the help of local grocers who were asked to remove watermelons and jelly doughnuts from their shelves, "because we know all about what they can do with those things, those damn deviants."

The female ban list called for the removal of; hospital type removable shower-heads, Mr. Microphone brand soap-on-a-ropes, vibrating muscle massagers and any and all posters of, "buff dudes in bath towels holding babies".

Residence Director of the Southwest living area, Ima Diddler, said that while she thought it would be difficult at first — in time the students would adapt.

"They'll learn to appreciate their quality time in different ways" said Diddler. "Maybe they'll start turning towards God by reading their bibles. Or perhaps they might start calling their parents and writing their grandmothers. That would be nice, don't you think?"

Palms' report also listed some unique forms of enforcement, "If we have to we're prepared to go the way of Big Brother", wrote Palms. "We'll wire up all the rooms and pump in the sounds of the student's grandparents having sex. That's a good one. And if they can keep it up through that then we'll come up with something even more disturbing. . . though I can't, for the life of me, imagine what that might be."

Student protest against the decision was, at press time, expected to be both stiff and rigid.

Collygian to be a star filled film

By GENE EBERT
Special to the Collygian

Yesterday, at the offices of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian here in Amherst, super agent Michael Ovitz signed a deal with Warner Brothers and director Martin Scorcese to translate Danielle Steele's best-seller, Massachusetts Daily Collygian — The Book, into Massachusetts Daily Collygian — The Movie.

This epic saga of the trials and tribulations of a college newspaper will surely be the biggest movie since Loaded Weapon I.

Renowned critic Jon Lupo says, "The 'Collygian' has more surprises than 'The Crying Game.'"

The star-studded cast is led by Al Pacino, who is portraying the role of the energetic David Rivera, editor-in-chief of the Collegian. Pacino said he feels that the role of Rivera will rank at the top of his list of his more challenging.

"Hey, the character of Mr. Rivera could possibly be as challenging as Michael Corleone [of The Godfather], with a bit more facial hair. I'm thrilled to get the role." Said Pacino.

When asked of the sensitive nature of the film, and what he expects from it, Scorcese said, "It's a cross between The Carol Burnett Show, Monty Python, and Caligula. I think the public will understand the plight of the staff after they see the film."

One of the most controversial characters, Michael Morrissey, a young conservative columnist, will be played by Michael J. Fox, who has had success in the past with Young Republican characters such as Family Ties' Alex P. Keaton.

"Alex was difficult to portray, because he went against the majority. I think Mike is misunderstood, and only wants attention. This is the direction I plan on taking," said Fox.

Two main characters, news editor Jason George and managing editor Michelle Bayliss, were casted even before the script was finished. Nick Nolte won the part of George, and seemed very pleased.

"It won't be one of the more exciting roles, but at least I get to smoke cigarettes throughout the film," said Nolte.

Bayliss will be played by Jean Tripplehorn, who received some acclaim for her portrayal of the psychologist Dr. Elizabeth Garner in Basic Instinct.

The cast is filled with many comics, such as Chris Elliott [portraying training director Greg Sukiennik], Marsha Warfield [Black Affairs editor Kristin St. John], and Anthony Michael Hall [sports writer Jason Nash].

Anson Williams, who has his first role since Potsie Webber on the television hit Happy Days as he plays Arts Associate Caleb Cochran, said, "It's great to be back in the biz."

Scorcese plans to introduce the first cartoon character into a major motion picture since Who Framed Roger Rabbit? with the casting of Elroy Jetson to play aspiring writer Glen Goland.

"Gee, Astro, who is Glen Goland anyway?" said Jetson, when he was informed of his part.

A sub-plot in the flick is about staffers Cutter Garcia [played by Doogie Howser M.D.'s Max Casella] and Art Stapleton's [played by Rodney Dangerfield] plea to get the town of Amherst to stop boycotting the television show, Beverly Hills 90210.

Bob Hoskins [from Who Framed Roger Rabbit fame] portrays ad rep Dan Wetzel. Hoskins' part consisted of looking around the campus for the video games Burgertime and Galaga, period. John Cusack recreated his classic role of Lloyd Dobler as he plays sports associate Jeff Crofts. Cusack is the movie's Pied Piper.

Chancellor caught with yak

By Dino and Mr. Finch
Collygian Staff

In a shocking turn of events, Chancellor Richard O'Brien was caught blue-balled in the newest Amherst brothel know as Fister's Havern Saturday morning.

Seemingly oblivious to the neon "Please, No Chancellors" sign in the window, O'Brien slapped down his AARP I.D., which was quickly confiscated by Candy Fugdup, Fister's official customer service representative.

"I had no idea we were letting Chancellors in," said Greece Itup, owner and head bouncer at Fister's, "he said he had photos of John Calipari in compromising positions, so I guess we made an exception."

O'Brien was thrown out when Itup found that the pictures were really of O'Brien and his shaven pet yak.

O'Brien was spotted entering Fister's through the second floor window at approximately 3:45 am Saturday. Maggie "the eye" Parot was on the scene to report the startling event.

"I was hiding in the bushes as usual, stinking of urine, when I heard someone yelling, 'Bring me the rubber chicken and a gallon of bloody petrol!' in a thick British accent. Of course, I called the damn cops."

Police found O'Brien and his executive attachie Bruce, cuddling in a pothole, singing old show tunes. They were just about to finish "Oklahoma!" when the coppers arrived.

O'Brien denies the entire incident.

"I had a gig at the Hatch that night and we were drunker than a boat full of baseball players. Where the hell is Fister's, anyway?"

In court yesterday, O'Brien pleaded "no concept" to fucking over the entire University.

Stupid trade Rocket man For Boggs

By AL STARR
Collision Staff

Do you believe in miracles? Sports fans all over the Commonwealth have just seen one of the more shocking trades in recent history.

As this trade came over the Associated Press wire last night, the entire staff was stunned. The Boston Red Sox traded Roger Clemens to the New York Yankees for Wade Boggs and $3 million.

When Boston General Manager Lou Gorman was asked of the trade, he said he wasn't going to let history repeat itself.

"We as a franchise have been criticized for letting Babe Ruth join the rival Yankees. Well, we weren't about to let Boggs make it two in a row," said Gorman.

"Gene Michael drove a hard bargain, but we feel we can survive without Clemens anyway. What did he do for us? I tell you what, we won't have any red carpets rolled out in spring training ever again!"

The Red Sox reacquired Nick Esasky, Phil Plantier, and Jack Clark, according to Gorman, in order to re-establish a powerhouse. The Sox also were close to inking Bill Buckner to another one year contract, but the deal slipped by.

In the NBA, the Celtics' Dave Gavitt announced that the team would exercise its right to trade the rights to Larry Bird's number 33 to the Dallas Mavericks for their number one pick in the upcoming draft.

"We felt if we acquired the No. 33, and hung it in the rafters of Reunion Arena, it would pack the house," said Mavericks owner Donald Carter. "We really didn't need another first round brat anyway."

Calipari needed to save Russian state Yeltsin looking to coach for stability

By ELROY VAULOR
Collygian Staff

It's time for the weekly trip around the world of sports. Coach Cal began his series of diplomatic off-season ventures in the former Soviet Union yesterday. Coach was spotted in Red Square trying to resolve the conflicts between Boris Yeltsin and the Congress of People's Deputies.

"Listen, you guys are the classiest nation in the world. You gotta stop arguing. Shut up! Shut up! I repeat classiest fans, oops I mean nation in the world."

Coach Cal's upcoming itinerary includes stops in the final four, Bosnia, South Africa, and an audience with Sadam Hussein.

Speaking of the Minutemen, inside sources have revealed that the basketball team will break each other's wrists in a public display of team unity at next year's midnight madness.

We regret to inform our readers Mike Morrissey will be resigning as Sports editor, to begin preparing for his run as Dan Quayle's vice presidential running mate.

"Mike Morrissey had the most compatible views to mine of all potential candidates. Trust me he's a hot potatoe," said the former vice-president.

Speaking of the draft. The Mighty Ducks GM Jack Ferrera announced that the Ducks plan to make Art Stapleton the franchise's first ever draft choice. This announcement came after Stapleton announced that he would forego his final years of eligibility for the big money contracts of the NHL. The New York Islanders are expected to trade up for the chance to draft Stapleton, this year's top Collegiate Defenseman.

The UMass mixed doubles luge team continued their winning ways with wins over Mount Holyoke and Simmons this weekend. Partners Oliver Clozov, and Olga Dropemandcov, remained undefeated this year.

The A.P poll has the Minuteman squad ranked 4th in the nation. Local rival Hampshire College remained atop the poll at 23-0.

Really Ticked Off Greeks Storm Collygian Offices

By BUTCH GOLDENBERG
Greek Bashing Editor

AMHERST— It was unheard of ever happening at the Amherst campus of The University Of Massachusetts. After hours and hours of waiting in Fraternity-Sorority park, aproximately 1000 greeks stormed the Campus Center Basement offices of the Collygian proclaiming that they feel they are underepresented in the campus'largest newspaper.

Scotty Lazer, president of ASR (Alpha Sigma Ro) told the Collygian "We are outraged, and livid. Every other fuckin' group on this campus has a page: Black, Jewish, Third World, Latino, Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, Asexual, Transexual, Alternative, Atheist, and Church of Scientology. All, but the fuckin' greeks. What we want is a little leeway and fair representation."

Long John and Haywood Jablomey co-presidents of Theta Sig both said "The Greeks want a weekly page in the Collygian. And until we get one we are holding an 13-way bad-ass exchange at the Collygian. We have officially taken it over."

Acting Chancellor Danforth Potatoe Quayle said about the uprising "This childish act is something that we expected from the Greeks. However, those loud rambunxious people won't be happy beacuse the Collygian's new offices are being built with the money taken from the cancelled women's sports teams are being built on the remaining grounds of the Fraternity-Sorority park. In addition, the park is being renamed NewsWorld where a theme park, second to Epcot will be built in hope of attracting writers to the University." Quayle went on to say "The Geeks, I mean the Greeks, demands mean shit and we are meeting to have all greeks banned from campus due to dirty rushing and for hazing."

The Collygian's old offices are being proclaimed by Stephie Sista, sister of AEY sorority, "the new sista's and brotha's meeting centa' for Greeks." The sit-in at the Collygian has caught the eye of the national media and stolen publicity and coverage form the Cult in Wacko, Texas.

Hollywood officals came in droves to try to buy story rights regarding the whole uprising. Producer, Andrew Ego commented "This is the story of the century." Also in the area was director, Casting Couch and he said "My people are intersted in meeting with any sorority chic that wants to sell her story and her body."

Sixth added as suspect in N.Y. blast

By RICHARD PYLE
Associated Press

NEW YORK— A new name was added Wednesday to the list of suspects in the bombing of the World Trade Center.

The new suspect Ramzi Ahmed Yousf has not been arrested but was included in an indictment that also includes Mahmud Abohalima, the alleged organizer if the Feb. 26 bombing.

The new names were the only changes from the indictment previously handed up against two 25-year-old suspects Nidal Ayyad of Maplewood, N.J., and Mohammed A. Salameh of Jersey City, N.J.

The four are charged with using explosives to maliciously damage and destroy the World Trade Center, resulting in the death of six people.

Earlier, Ayyad's attorney said authorities want to compare a computer printer used by Ayyad to a letter claiming responsibility for the deadly blast.

An examination of the printer form Ayyad's office will show it didn't print the letter, said his attorney, Leonard Weinglass.

The one page letter received by The New York Times a few days after the bombing last month said the "Liberation Army Fifth Battalion" planted the explosives to protest U.S. support for Israel.

Weinglass, who said Wednesday that authorities took the printer from Allied Signal Corp. on Tuesday, said later that it hadn't yet been picked up. Company spokesman Mark Greenberg said the printer was an NEC Pinwriter.

Various type styles in the letter suggest it was printed on a more sophisticated machine than the one Ayyad used at his office in Morris Township, N.J. Weinglass said. Ayyad was suspended without pay after his arrest earlier this month.

Ayyad's home computer was seized when he was arrested. There was no printer in his New Jersey home.

The 25-year-old chemical engineer and three other Muslims have been charged in the bombing that killed six people and injured about 1,000.

The Daily News reported Wednesday that it received a telephone call the day after the Feb.26 bombing from someone identifying himself as "The Liberation Army." The caller claimed responsibility for the bombing and said a "demand" would be mailed to the paper.

Ousted lesbian soldier to speak

To lecture at UMass after testifying before Congress

By MELANIE DESILVA
Collegian Staff

After 25 years of commended military service as Chief Nurse of the Washington State National Guard, Col. Margarethe Cammermeyer was told to pack her bags.

Her impeccable record, her ability to gain respect, her leadership skills, and her precedent setting achievements within the armed forces became irrelevant with the utterance of one word: lesbian.

After speaking before Congress this week about lifting the restrictions on homosexual inclusion in the military, Colonel Cammermeyer will come to UMass to talk about being a lesbian in the United States army.

"She's a very well-respected and high ranking woman within the military structure who is speaking out against this policy in the army," said Ali Woolwich, coordinator for Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual Awareness Week.

In fact, Cammermeyer is the highest ranking officer ever to be discharged from the military for being gay, lesbian, or bisexual. Receiving a bronze star for her 14-month tour in Vietnam, Cammermeyer was also named Nurse of the Year by the Veteran's Administration, and has published several important research papers.

A mother of four, Cammermeyer has fought to dispel the idea women should abandon fantasies of military careers for more "suitable" pursuits like motherhood.

Successfully balancing a military career and family, Cammermeyer worked for child care provisions for military personnel.

"She's spoken out and has set precedents for women in the military, and specifically for women with children," Woolwich said.

Senate finds finalists for chancellor lacking

By ALYSSA M. OWENS
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate unanimously voted last night to ask the University of Massachusetts to reopen its chancellor search.

"To be blunt, the candidates presented to the students on this campus for the job of chancellor were inadequate and substandard," said former Senate Speaker Mike Poster, who along with the other student government officers relinquished his position to students elected this spring.

"We, the undergraduates, feel that the search should be reopened to lead us into the 21st century and make us the world-class university we should be," Poster said.

The three finalists for the chancellorship visited the University during the past two weeks and participated in forums with students, faculty and staff.

Poster said the current candidates lack adequate knowledge of student issues, financial issues, state legislation, alumni affairs and undergraduate education.

"I saw all the candidates and none had the experience and expertise in lobbying for higher education in addressing tuition and fees issues," said former Student Government President Jen Wood.

Wood cited overemphasis on research, instead of undergraduate issues as one of the candidates' weaknesses.

"While I think it's important that the chancellor has scholarly experience, we need someone that will deal not only with graduate education but with the needs of undergraduate students," Wood said.

The Senate's request will be referred to the Chancellor Richard O'Brien's office, President Michael Hooker's office and the Chancellor Search Committee for further consideration, Poster said.

If the search is reopened and a new chancellor is not hired by June, when O'Brien's interim term elapses, either O'Brien's stay would be extended or another interim chancellor would take office until an adequate candidate is found to fill the position permanently.

Business as usual for Twisters while efforts at sale continue

By MARK PRESTON
Collegian Staff

Contrary to popular rumors, Twisters Tavern, a popular student bar in downtown Amherst, will not be closing down.

Mark Forsyth, the owner of Twisters said, "The rumor mill has been rampant and we have had rumors ever since we opened.

"I hear some real funny ones and they make me laugh," he said.

Forsyth has been working since November with a brokerage company to sell the bar. He said the town will not allow him to sell the bar and is forcing him to continue to operating it.

ALO East, Forsyth's corporation, is currently in chapter 11 bankruptcy court.

Forsyth said he is currently working with the magistrate court to clear up the matter.

He said he originally planned to operate Twisters for five years, make some money and then sell it. He alleges constant harassment from the town of Amherst has reinforced his original plan to sell the bar.

Forsyth said he wants to sell the bar to the Apache River Corporation, which is made up of two former Steiger's executives, John Oakland of Wilbraham and William Miller of Holyoke.

Forsyth said, "William Miller and John Oakland are the most serious people interested in purchasing the bar as well as being the most capable and respectable."

Twisters' sale hit a snag last Thursday night when the Zoning Board of Appeals voted two-to-one to reject a proposal by the Apache River Corporation to increase the capacity of Twisters from 120 to 199 occupants.

Miller said this figure would be needed in order to operate Twisters as a profitable business.

Richard Howland, the attorney for the Apache River Corporation, said he used the Commonwealth of Massachusetts plumbing code to arrive at this occupancy figure.

A letter was hand-delivered by Miller to the Zoning Board of Appeals yesterday morning which asked the board to reconsider its decision, sources said.

The letter reinforced the request for an occupancy increase and stated that Twisters is not the sole source of the noise created in the downtown area.

The letter also said the fights and arrests on Saturday night in downtown Amherst did not occur in the proximity of Twisters, but rather on North Pleasant

State Police Breakup Whitmore Sit-in; Carry off 34

Throughout the afternoon the group prepared for the evening vigil. A large supply of food was purchased and instructions on courses of action when the police came were given at periodic intervals.

The protest against all recruiting began Monday when the Committee brought a demand to Dean Field asking that a public debate with the Dow Chemical recruiter be held before he met with interviewees. One member of the committee stated the debate would enable those being interviewed "to understand what kind of company they would be working for."

Dean Field told the group "It is my attempt to dissuade you from remaining."

Several minutes later the state police, in full riot equipment entered the lobby and carried the students out in a swift operation. Each student was carried by two policemen. In response to a manner which some present believe to be overly forceful, several authorized spectators and demonstrators shouted at police to "take it easy, take it easy, they want to go". A State Police officer supervised the operation with the same warning to "take it easy".

Seder unifies Blacks, Jews

By TONY ROGERS
Associated Press

BOSTON — Suki Stiles, 11, had never been to a Seder, and didn't know it was the feast that begins the Jewish holiday of Passover. That didn't stop her from enjoying every minute.

"My grandmother asked me to come. She told me I was going to a play," said Stiles, who is Black. "But it's fun, it's different. I can get into the music."

Some 300 people, gathering in the basement of a Methodist church Tuesday in the city's South End, held what has become an annual happening here, a Passover Seder attended by the Jewish people and the Black people.

Organizers of the event, which began 13 years ago, say it symbolizes the common bond between Jews and Blacks in a time of highly publicized tensions between them.

"We probably work together on more issues and have more common ground than any other two ethnic groups," said Leonard Zakim, regional director of the Anti Defamation League.

With matzos and macaroons, the feast which commemorates the exodus of the Jews from Egypt, adhered to tradition.

But after the meal, those assembled sang "Let my People Go," adding verses about the plight of Jews in the former Soviet Union and about South African leader Nelson Mandela. There was also a chorus of "We Shall Overcome," with singers holding hands.

Mightier than the Penn

This week's lead story comes from the pages of The Daily Pennslyvanian, the student newspaper of the University of Pennslyvania.

The Daily Penn proved it was more than just a dummy exercise for a high school copy editing class by publishing a column entitled "A Front Row View" by Matt Kelly, which provided all three of its readers with a "Guided tour of UMass & all of its 'glory.'"

Once I plowed through the grammatical mistakes, layout blunders and fragmented sentences, which only a group of students who scored 1300 on their SAT could provide, I realized Kelly, in all of his wisdom, was poking fun at our State U.

Unfortunately, according to Kelly, a Milton, Mass. native, the student body in Amherst is mainly public school graduates from the Bay State, who generally amount to nothing. Of course, Kelly and his prep school brethren are above that.

"News from other U's" has made two excursions to the Penn campus this year and its all-knowing conclusion of the Ivy League school is this: some architecture nice houses a snobby group of whining, self-centered, BMW-driving students, whose father's income is roughly the equivalent of the gross national product of the nation of Quatar.

Now on to the real important stuff. Kelly describes the Daily Collegian as a rag, which he should know about considering where he works. But, until Penn has a newspaper with a national ranking (No. 22) as high as the Collegian's, or a column with the magnitude and the readership of this space, the Quakers should keep their collective noses in the air and stick to playing basketball.

Erin Go Braugh

Parade watchers in South Boston jeered and heckled 25 Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual individuals as they marched through the city during Sunday's St. Patrick's Day parade, The Daily Free Press, the student paper at Boston University, reported.

No violence was reported but the marchers were greeted hostilely by many of the 200,000 people who attended the Commonwealth's largest Irish celebration. Many residents felt the homosexual contingent did not belong in the parade.

"None of them are from Southie and all of a sudden after 90 years they want to get into the parade," said 20-year-old South Boston resident Andrea Neff. "The only reason they're here is because we don't want them here."

South Boston resident Joe Kelly said, "I don't want my kids growing up around this stuff. They have their own parade down on Tremont Street. Why all of a sudden do they want to come to South Boston?"

Some defended the marchers saying they have a right to march because of their Irish heritage.

"They have every right to be here," non-resident Dee Dee Adams said. "The hostile reactions from the crowd are uncalled for."

About 30 Boston police officers monitored the marchers and no acts of violence or confrontation other than verbal were reported.

One South Boston man was seen wearing a T-shirt reading "99-years without the queers."

March boredom

Apparently oblivious to the normal excitement which sweeps most college campuses during the NCAA men's basketball tournament, interest at Purdue University for its Boilermakers was far from feverish.

According to the Exponent, the student newspaper on campus, local bars were far from crowded while the Purdue-Rhode Island first round game was televised.

"I think its because of St. Patrick's Day," a local bartender said. "Everyone who came out then is staying in now and saving money. But I thought it would be busier considering it's a tournament game."

Purdue, located in West Lafayette, Ind., had to contend with state-wide enthusiasm from Indiana University, which entered the tournament as a favorite to reach the Final Four, and that may have kept the enthusiasm down, one student argued.

Growth called silent explosion

Population expert warns of '27 Somalias by 2000'

By TOM KNIGHT
Collegian Staff

Citing a U.N. study, a population expert predicted there could be "27 Somalias in Africa by the year 2000" if the continent's population growth rate continued unchecked.

Werner Fornos, president of the Washington D.C.-based Population Institute, discussed the "silent explosion" of global overpopulation and its consequences Tuesday night at Smith College.

According to Fornos, "the greatest obstacle is the male attitude. Men seem to think it's their destiny to spread their seeds and then walk away from the responsibility."

"The women of the world do two-thirds of all the work, earn only one-tenth of the income and own less than 1 percent of the property." Still, Fornos said, "The policy makers are 96 percent men."

Fornos went so far as to say that "after the threat of nuclear war, the most dangerous weapon in the world is the male [sex] organ."

According to Fornos, the four most compelling goals to stemming world population growth should be eradicating "illiteracy in girls, providing them with at least an eighth grade education, income enhancement especially for women, reducing infant mortality, and greater availability of family planning so that couples have the knowledge and means to control their fertility."

Fornos stressed that "there is no room for coercion" in family planning. Rather, he said he seeks "family planning steeped in volunteerism; designed, planned and implemented by women instead of men. Informed people making informed decisions."

Fornos praised the U.S. government for not allowing the export of any new birth control technology that was not on the market in its own country.

While most of the audience enthusiastically supported Fornos' sentiments, several said it would be more appropriate to focus on the consumption in the industrialized countries instead of overpopulation in developing nations.

Another dissenter accused Fornos of supporting a conspiracy to limit population in the West while promoting population growth in non-western nations.

A senior citizen implored others in the audience to help reduce fossil fuel consumption by riding the bus. Echoing Fornos, she said "the car is right up there with the male organ" as a global menace.

In addition to his duties in Washington, Fornos also serves as a population growth consultant to several Third World governments.

Feminist issues seek exposure with local radio

By JESSIE DAVENPORT
Collegian Correspondent

The public awareness of women's issues is increasing through local radio programs, according to the WMUA women's issues director.

Stacy Horne, a sophomore communications major minoring in women's studies, said she is working to encourage education and information on current women's issues through the Women's Media Project.

"People think being a feminist is being a harsh, radical, political person," Horne said, "but it just means that you are interested in the equality of people."

Horne said in working to make people aware of feminist issues she has realized people don't know a lot about women's issues and don't see them as part of mainstream radio programming.

Horne said the Women's Media Project is a program that works through the WMUA Women's Affairs Department. She said the project works to help raise awareness for organizations such as the Everywoman's Center, Necessities/Necessidades, LBGA, and Womanshelter Compañeras, a women's rape victim shelter through public service announcements.

She said WMUA's Women's Issues Department acts as a liason between the community and the radio station

Palestinian relations debated

By LISA GREENFIELD
Collegian Correspondent

Sarah Ozacky-Lazar, associate director for the Institute for Arabic Studies at Givat Haviva, spoke Tuesday night in the Hillel House Lounge about the issues and dilemmas of Palestinian relations within the state of Israel.

The conversation flared up several times due to the problems of indefinable issues and uncertainties of the peace question.

Lazar opened the discussion by noting the difficulty of defining the focus of her discussion on Israeli-Palestinian relations. She said several issues need immediate resolution and she expressed the urgency of the matters.

Lazar outlined the history of the Palestinians, including the different divisions of Israel, ranging from the 1947 U.N. Partition up to today's plight of refugees and Arab-Israelis.

She said 17 percent of Israel's population consists of Palestinians who theoretically have the rights of citizens, including voting, education and inclusion in the society in Israel.

Lazar said the Israelis tend to discriminate against the Palestinians. She said this stems from their failure to distinguish Palestinians within the state of Israel with those from the West Bank and Gaza.

However, she also noted the Israeli feelings of being a minority stem from their fear of violence against them, despite their status as the majority.

She said, "In the most recent elections, it was found that many Israelis are tired of dealing with the Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza."

Lazar said they are tired of taking responsibility for people that hate Israel. She said she feels that domestic problems should be taking priority over the welfare, economics and security of the refugees.

Lazar stressed the immediate need for compromise, emphasizing the tragic bloodshed due to hesitation in peace talks.

"The two sides are polarizing to the two ends of the extremes and are destroying domestic society," Lazar said.

Lazar said attempting to sum up the issues involved in the often volatile debate was not easy. Nevertheless, in Lazar's opinion, the world is at historical crossroads that should be taken advantage of now.

Without the threat of the Cold War and with America as an ally, peace talks must be started. Resolution requires each side to give a little, and Lazar said she feels each side wants to attain peace, but did not offer any real solution other than the actual sitting down to find a compromise right away.

The institute Lazar works for attempts to foster dialogue between Arabs and Israelis. The institute teaches Arabic language and culture to Israelis in hopes to promote understanding and coexistence. The ultimate goal is to bridge the gap and bring together people of the two communities.

The program incorporates research and works with teachers, women and children, organizing groups to get to know each other on individual levels. About 10,000 people are involved with the institute's various programs. Lazar is now working on her doctoral dissertation on Arab communities in Israel.

Editorial/Opinion

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers or cartoonists and do not necessarily reflect those of the Collegian unless otherwise noted.

Asian Night offers positive images

Ms. Ivatury's column [Collegian, March 29] attacked Asian Night and all it came to symbolize. She wrote of "contempt for the lives of people in the countries," "vacuous symbolism" and, my favorite, "reinforcing stereotypes of a Eurocentric American audience." I admire her for her passionate geo-socio-econo-political commentary on the torrid state of Asian affairs on this campus, however, her anger is misdirected and grossly exaggerated.

Asian Night has come to represent a growing community of students who would like to rid themselves of the pervasive stereotype of the "silent minority." We are more than engineering/medical/business students scurrying off the the nearest library, crouched under the weight of our overloaded backpacks.

We are diverse and dynamic individuals who want to go beyond the homogeneity of our stereotype. Yes, we do exercise a great deal of political activism, however, our activism is not manifested in a "grouchy" Collegian column.

The Western media constantly bombards Americans with negative images of Asians. Many of these images are pure fabrications not unlike the "anti-communism" propaganda of decades past. The festive gathering was loud, colorful and uplifting. It was a chance for the non-Asian community to appreciate the Eastern hemisphere in a light they had probably never experienced before: a positive one.

Courtesy of the media, the negative mental associations come easily. Iraq: violent oppressors, Palestine: terrorists, Pakistan/India: hungry children, Cambodia: boat people, Thailand: prostitutes. These negative labels are misleading and hurtful.

Asian Night left me with several positive images of a community of which I am a proud member. I might also add that Asian night addressed several issues that would satiate even your ravenous appetite. Ms. Ivatury, your diatribe on our supposed wrongdoings stinks of a holier-than-thou attitude that I have witnessed far too often in people who just criticize but do not contribute.

I wholeheartedly support every statistic in your column and am often frustrated by the utter hypocrisy of U.S. foreign policy. It is a shame that a country with such a reverent stance toward human life can turn a blind eye to the atrocities in the East. However, your negativism is counterproductive and inconsistent. You speak of a Eurocentrism when it is obvious that your disgust of our "brightly colored garbs" and "traditional songs" is borne out of social prejudices you have acquired in the West.

You went on to state that "Asia symbolizes the history of humanity' struggle against exploitation, colonialism and barbarism." Hardly. "Symbolizes" is an awfully strong word. I suppose the splendor of the Mughal Empire and the widespread power of the Chinese dynasties are just figments of our collective imagination. Ms. Ivatury, your letter is affront to those members of the community who spent many long hours preparing for a social event that will do just fine without you next year, thank you.

It's okay, they wanted it

Four members of the Portland Trailblazers basketball team picked up three runaway girls, ages 15 and 16, at a mall in Utah and took them to a hotel for some fun and games last winter.

Four professional, adult men and three young girls.

Rape charges were filed against the men, but later dropped because the 15 year old did not have sex, and the two 16 year olds had consented to sex — no Utah laws were broken. Sports fans declared their heroes vindicated. Those girls were loose, they were sluts. They wanted to have sex.

Darienne
HOSLEY

Nine teenage boys in Lakewood, Calif., spent time in jail last week, charged with molesting and raping girls as young as 10. These boys are members of the Spur Posse, a group of 20 to 30 young men who engage in a little friendly competition: "hooking up." So far, 19-year-old Billy Shehan takes the lead — he's had sex 66 times.

Some parents were surprised, a few were upset, others were damn proud. The father of two Spur Posse members says the girls were "giving it away," and his sons are "all man."

Students at Lakewood High are wearing black armbands to protest the arrests. Those girls were loose, they were sluts. They wanted to have sex.

Except some of the girls said they didn't want to.

And most of these girls were underage, according to statutory rape laws.

"They're trying to get popular by doing my friends."

The Spur Posse is trying to get popular by out-"doing" their friends.

But the girls are sluts, and the boys are "virile specimens," according to one proud dad.

Something is very wrong here.

Why are 10-, 12- and 15-year-old girls being held responsible for getting the boys in trouble? Are they really mature enough to decide whether or not they should be having sex?

Adolescence is a notoriously rough time, particularly for girls. As they change physically, they often feel self-conscious, ashamed, embarrassed, insecure. These are not feelings that will boost self-esteem. The boys around them are changing too, but their physical changes reinforce their self-esteem.

Hormones and confidence on one side, new sexuality and low confidence on the other. And sex becomes a power play.

Sex should not be a path to popularity. Sex should not be one person "doing" another. These are immature and dangerous understandings of sex.

But they're reinforced in song lyrics, television commercials, music videos — all that's fashionable in "teen culture."

The theme of the dangerous, obsessed female has overrun the box office — the Amy Fisher saga, Basic Instinct, Single White Female — stories of evil women who try to use sex for power. Then there's Honeymoon in Vegas and Mad Dog & Glory — men making deals, with women as currency.

It would be easy to put all the blame on the Spur Posse lads or on the Portland basketball players for taking advantage of young girls, but the messages of pop culture have created the environment.

"Those girls around my son are giving it away."

"They're not the prettiest, you know."

The boys are "all man."

"I know one girl who did every Spur and she was proud of it. They take advantage of girls and treat them like crap in the morning, but they didn't rape anyone."

Those girls are loose, they're sluts. They wanted to have sex.

"Nothing my boy did was anything that any red-blooded American boy wouldn't do at his age."

Critic ignorant of Western genre

This is in response John Lupo and his opinions of Clint Eastwood's Unforgiven [Collegian, March 29].

He obviously doesn't appreciate the genre of the Western, because if he had any idea about its nature, he wouldn't write Unforgiven is "hardly revelatory." The Western genre is the only mythology this country has, and any movie in that vein has to be looked at in context. If Mr. Lupo doesn't understand this, if he hasn't seen great past Westerns like John Ford's The Man Who Shot Liberty Vallance, Sergio Leone's Once Upon a Time in the West, then he has no business criticizing Unforgiven, because it takes what those magnificent movies had to say one step further.

Eastwood has made a poetic film about death and the inability to escape the past, as well as show the hypocrisy in self-righteous behavior. You should know what you're talking about before you write about it, and you shouldn't mimic fashionable, knee-jerk, "Hollywood sucks" movie reviewers like Peter Travers from Rolling Stone. The Crying Game may be a great movie, but it is a great movie that relies on a gimmick. Unforgiven relies only on uncomfortable truths.

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

Spring has sprung.

Though there is a chance that you trudged through a fresh layer of snow on your way to class this morning, the evidence is incontrovertable. The year's first noon rally on the Student Union steps is a better harbinger of the impending thaw than any foul or less politically active mammal.

My Southern-raised housemate managed to sink his Chevy "Impaler" up to its axles in the soupy quagmire beside our house that the landlady refers to as the driveway.

As he summoned a wrecker with a borrowed AAA card, I stood ankle high in the muck during Sunday's drizzle, with images of brontosaurs struggling in the LeBrea tar pits in my head and the realization that I'd probably missed the best skiing in a decade bicycling back and forth to winter session classes with icicles growing on my beard.

Along the bottom of the comics page, underneath the menu and the list of dedicated staffers who were up until 2 a.m. last night, is a disclaimer disavowing responsibility for the content of the page. This newspaper equivalent of a surgeon general's warning was instituted three semesters ago in response to a staff member's complaint that an installment of Gary Larson's "The Far Side" was in poor taste for portraying a pizza deliverer entering Saddam Hussein's war room and asking, "All right, who ordered the mother of all pizzas?" The fact that we had published this nationally syndicated strip was later presented as evidence that the Collegian was a racist paper.

Though this probably brought more laughter than the strip did the first time around, it was only the latest in a series of conflagrations over the comics page.

Josh
REYNOLDS

Around three years ago a student penned a strip called "Frotter," which parodied racist views but was misconstrued as endorsing those views. Although Black faculty members defended the strip's intent, a group of less understanding students demanded that the strip be discontinued. After a heated confrontation with the managing editor, the artist was removed from the staff (you can't really fire someone who doesn't get paid).

These experiences lead to such paranoia in the newsroom that we censored a week's worth of "Cast of Thousands" last year a priori because they dealt with the subject of race. A few White editors, after months of hounding by the self-appointed judges of culture, acceptable politics and decency, were convinced that they were incapable of judging whether or not a comic had racist overtones. However, the most recent incident involving "The Adventures of Fred" is a different symptom of this same affliction.

Many people are simply incapable of writing or interpreting humor. (If prior experience is any guide, there is plenty of evidence to that effect in the April Fool's wrap to today's paper.) The Collegian makes an effort to support student cartoonists. Unfortunately there hasn't been one worth reading since Barry Deutsche took an indefinite leave of absence last year.

In a final note, it's disappointing that the GLB organizers of Monday's demonstration have chosen to prove that they are as tactless as those they are trying to sway. "Stooping to their level" is rarely a wise policy. Call me a prude, but the public exchange of bodily fluids is in bad taste no matter who participates.

If acceptance into mainstream culture means taking a bullet in the side in a dispute over the national machismo/economic dependency, or adopting human society's equivalent of territorial pissing, then I'd prefer a hermitage in Vermont.

Jen Wood cleans out 420 Student Union and moves on Today, Jennifer Wood is an ex-president of the Student Government Association.

Her one-year term ended yesterday and she has passed that mantle on to David Nunez, and with it an office in 420 Student Union. She would have liked to be president for another year, yet she knows it's time to move on.

But moving on means moving out, and the president's office at 420 Student Union is kind of small, even when it's free of clutter. So Tuesday night, Jennifer Wood, student, cleaned out what had been her home away from home for the past year.

Those of us who will graduate in 52 days, including yours truly, will eventually have to do what Wood did Tuesday night — clean up after ourselves and move along.

But that entails a lot more than throwing fliers and outdated memos into the circular file. There's a lot of memories to sort through. There's also the realization that a chapter of your life has just ended.

"I find myself saying 'Let go, Jen, let go,'" she said. "I've been saying that for almost a year."

She hadn't taken the posters down yet; that would be saved for last. Many of them date back four years, even longer. "Robb Smith and Brian Crawford for Amherst Town Meeting," for example.

"That was before I knew the two of them," Wood explained. As for their showing in the election? "They got smoked."

Jim Collins is on her wall, too. She worked on his campaign for the U.S. House of Representatives seat now held by John Olver. Jon Hite's bumper sticker is on her wall. So are various posters for on-campus events over the past four years such as Pina Loca and a visit by environmentalist Dr. Helen Caldicott.

Greg
SUKIENNIK

But the most telling poster on Jen Wood's wall, the one she says she might not leave behind for David Nunez, is from 1989, when students mobilized, united and fought spiraling tuition hikes and draconian budget cuts. That semester's student activism still stands out as the most productive in recent memory.

The picture on the poster is a wide-angle shot of the 15,000 students who stood on the Statehouse steps in October 1989. "What if all these students were voters?" it asked.

"I would say that semester shaped me greatly. That and the student strike," Wood said.

Wood has been active in student government all four years at UMass. It wasn't always as productive and harmonious as it is now. In 1990, when the Student Senate was losing senators left and right and stifled by ideological differences, its leadership turned control of the Senate over to the administration.

Some students applauded the action as the only way to change student government. Others were aghast. Jen Wood was on the "reform" side of the issue, and was set to run as student trustee in the "new" Student Senate.

But that was before the administration pulled the rug out from under her.

"When the [Student Senate] destroyed itself I was a senator. . . I was considered to be one of the 'reformers,'" Wood says. "Since then I've come full circle."

"I have few regrets," she said. She didn't take credit for everything, but there was a long list of accomplishments she was proud of: the re-birth of the Student Center for Education Research and Advocacy, the appointment of Thomas Robinson as vice-chancellor of Student Affairs and increased participation in the Student Senate by the Third World Caucus were just a few.

"Few regrets." That sounds like a good way to graduate to me.

Greg Sukiennik will only be a columnist for five more weeks.

Hartnett's friends extend warm thanks

We would like to publicly thank the administration, faculty and students of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst for their support, care and concern during the days following the tragedy we experienced.

We extend our immense gratitude to the:

[bullet] Dean of Students Office, for their immediate and efficient reaction to our crisis and amazing overall support. Without their assistance we would not have survived the past two weeks as well as we somehow did.

[bullet] Department of Public Safety and UMass Police

- Massachusetts State Police
- Sunderland Police Department
- Newman Center
- Everywoman's Center
- Mental Health Services
- Campus Center Hotel staff, especially house keeping
- Housing Assignments Office
- Residential staff and house councils for their clothing and monetary donations

Thanks again to all who attended the memorial service held for Tara on March 23. Your presence was deeply appreciated. For those who did not know Tara, we hope you walked away with a better sense of who this wonderful woman was. Words cannot express our thanks to our families and close friends for standing by our sides, for the hugs and for sharing our tears and pain.

Looking for the Third World reality

I am getting used to having people talk to me about how I should live my life or think. People who do not know what they are talking about. I am getting used to hearing people tell me how I am supposed to think, live and act as a person of color, as a woman of color.

I know I am person of color. In fact, I have been one since I was born.

Evelyn A.
DE JESÚS

When I came to UMass, I found people telling me how I was supposed to behave and think as person of color, what I was supposed to think about the political status of Puerto Rico (in my case that is where I come from. Am I a person of color now?) and what I should think about people from the mainland.

If I do not think or act like that then I have a colonized mentality. Many of those who talk about the oppression of the capitalist system have never been in need of running away for their country, or wondered about what they are going to eat the next day.

There is always the pressure of representing the Third World reality. They tell how that reality should be, according to their professor in that Gen Ed course they took. If I do not follow their criteria then I guess I am oppressing my own people and you know the rest.

The most daring ones say I cannot represent it because I am light-skinned, my hair is brown and I do not fit the stereotype of the person of color. That I am light-skinned means that in my heritage, I do not know how many generations before me, there was White blood. In my case it is Spaniard, representing the oppressor for the Hispanic culture. Because of that criteria, I may not be eligible to be a person of color. If I am light-skinned then I cannot represent that Third World reality people are talking about in classrooms.

Well, the reason behind it is that, "I am not the reality." No, I am not a reality, I am a spirit, a vision of the Holy. I do not exist and I am invisible. If they have never been out of their state, then why do they open their big mouths to tell me about mine? How come they dare to say that? This is the most disrespectful and humiliating thing I can hear. I do not have to give explanations on how many generations have been before me, where they came from or how I was raised and where. I do not have to apologize.

The adventurous ones dare to tell me, and try to argue with me on what should I think of Puerto Rico's political status. However, they are not willing to go there and help to build it up as a country if it turns to be independent.

They say how bad and mean the so-called "Americans" are, but they are in UMass working as teaching assistants, and taking advantage of that oppressive capitalist system they complain about. Americans are bad, mean and oppressive but they don't think that about their green bucks.

It is awesome to go and have dinner at a nice place after that excellent intellectual's oppression lecture we attended. You know, you go to a restaurant and the waitress comes and brings you a nice menu and you choose what you want to have for dinner. You ask her what is better.

While you wait, you chat with your friends about how deep the lecture was. How well prepared the speaker is, etc. Food comes, it was great. You pay, tip the waitress and you leave.

You ate what my people harvested and no one said anything.

Kosher Kitchen tops D.C.

Coming to college usually requires a certain amount of preparation, determination and the ability to adjust to situations you would normally not face while at home. As a "first year student," you need to adjust to independence, lack of privacy, roommate(s), classes and one thing in particular — your new eating facilities.

Erica L.
MOSS

Going to the dining commons is culture shock in itself. Now not only do you have to leave your room and face the unpredictable weather, but you are compelled to consume the disgusting slop they claim is delicious.

Some, like my parents, say I am "too picky," but I am sure there are many of you unsatisfied D.C. goers who would like to be reassured that there is a way out of this hell. I'm sure you can agree that cereal, fruit and tuna can get a little repetitive.

Want an alternative? How about the Kosher Kitchen? Fortunately I discovered this source of salvation, with the help of my dear roommate. It was like gourmet cooking compared to the barely edible "food" at the regular D.C.

The Kosher D.C. is centrally located in the heart of Southwest by Hampden Gallery. Anyone can attend. You do not have to be Jewish nor do you have to be kosher. The K.D.C. provides one meal, dinner, a day. The food is required to meet certain standards, therefore, you know you are not eating cat? dog? fish? or chicken? The slight increase in price is worth the results — sanitary, real, decent food.

As you walk into the K.D.C., you are greeted by chummy faces and served by people who don't seem to want to throw the food at you. Instead, they are pleased to serve you. The area where you receive your dinner and eat it is spotless. French fries aren't smashed on the ground, welcoming you to slip and break your neck, rather, it is clean and peaceful. The atmosphere is soothing after a treacherous day of classes. While you eat you have the pleasure of watching the sun slowly disappear behind the picturesque Berkshire Mountain Range. Now, doesn't this sound inviting?

On the contrary, you have your ordinary dining commons. Unlike K.D.C., here you can smell the stench of the latest kill from miles down campus. Not only are you not really clear on what you are being served, but your body rejects it, pleading for something substantial.

As you sit there contemplating the salad bar or the cereal, you decide to approach the salad bar. Bad idea. You eye the lettuce, wilted and drenched by the residue water. The rest of the vegetables look like they were picked from the day-old pile at the supermarket. When you go back to search for maybe even an apple a pear that isn't dented on all sides, you realize you are not going to have much luck.

After your struggle, you walk back to your overcrowded table with a tiny bun in one hand and a glass of flat soda in the other. Another unsuccessful attempt. Your stomach is growling, your head hurts — what should you do? Order pizza? Nah — why go through the unnecessary fuss and money; that could be sent on bigger and better things.

I've been a lot happier with my choice of eating dinner at the Kosher Kitchen. If you are not happy with the main meal, the salad bar is always a positive experience. If you are unhappy and tired of coming home with a hole in your stomach, give Kosher a try — chances are you will be pleased.

Comics aren't racial, just funny

I can't believe that Reginald Pickett has nothing better to do than to try to find far-fetched underlying messages in a comic strip that has never even hinted towards a racial topic in the past. Not only did he search for these racial slurs, he actually troubled other students and even faculty with his nothing more than bothersome dilemma. I also think that whoever these "many people" were who said, "This is ridiculous, he should be fired," were probably agreeing with Reginald just to get him off their backs.

Anyone could take almost any comic strip, article, editorial or news letter and find something racial in it, if he/she had the time to search and pry long enough. These comics aren't written to be racial, they're written to be funny. Don't you understand that word — funny?

Culture, ideas define the person

The column, "Asian heritage exploited," [Collegian, March 29] condemned Asian Night as an "extravagant, self-indulgent, exploitative display of orientalism by the immigrant community." I attended this event to "devour, vulgarize and prostitute the rich traditions of Asia." The letter listed many injustices Asians have faced because of the practices of the United States and its apathetic, self-centered Asian population. The author offered, "Clinging to vacuous symbolism while denying their complicity with a system that exploits people on the Asian continent will not bring Asian Americans any closer to their roots, nor can it restore their sense of pride."

I am an American of Japanese descent. I am a U.S. citizen. I pay taxes, voted in the last election and I will debate anyone who claims I am any less American than any other citizen. While my mind and heart will always belong to this country, my blood and flesh are of my Japanese ancestors. I have been told that I have no claim to the culture of my forefathers. I refuse to accept this. While my citizenship to this country remains my most prized possession, the culture and ideals that have remained in my family are some of the most influential things defining who I am as a person. This is my heritage, and who but I can determine when it has been exploited?

I saw Asian Night from beginning to end, and what I saw was not "vulgar" and "exploitative." I saw students explore their cultural identity and hare that knowledge with other people. The dramatic piece dedicated to Vincent Chin brought up many problems faced by Asian Americans today. The colorful dances and performance showed what rich and diverse cultures we have brought to this country. Even the lighter moments brought things down to a more real level, one common to all cultures. What I saw was a group of people from many different backgrounds and cultures coming together to celebrate who they are, not degrading our Asian heritage, but sharing it with those who cared to accept it.

I cannot speak for all who attended, just as I cannot speak for all Asian Americans. We are all individuals with different ideas and beliefs. But I am not gaining false pride through "vacuous symbolism." If you care to even look, I'm sure you will find many who will agree with me.

Elections for Senate speaker and treasurer were held at the meeting.

The new Senate speaker is Matthew Pavesi, while new treasurer is Peter Roaf.

Pavesi and Roaf were sworn into office last night, along with new Student Government President David Nunez and new Student Trustee Al Lizana.

Lizana will officially become a Board of Trustees member July 1.

The Senate voted to allow the Student Center for Education Research and Advocacy Board to hire a student coordinator immediately. The board is still seeking a director for the center.

Street.

A source said Miller was using the letter to illustrate his view that Twisters is not the problem that some people are making it out to be.

Residents of the Clark House Apartment complex, a predominately elderly residence, frequently complain about alleged noise and lewdness that occurs after Twisters closes each night.

Forsyth said, "We are not the entire problem, although I realize we are part of a much bigger problem.

"Everyone is complaining about people urinating on their lawns and bushes, but there is no public rest room in Amherst," Forsyth said. "Everyone is complaining about litter, but how many trash cans are there around?"

He said, "They are complaining about the students and the businesses which attract the students, but when the students are outside they are not the businesses' responsibility."

Forsyth said, "All the businesses in the downtown area are to blame for the noise that is created and I think Twisters is being targeted for all the problems which occur."

Zoning Board members said they are concerned with the location of Twisters and its proximity to the Clark House.

Edward Sunderland, one of the zoning board members who opposed the transfer said, "A large number of people will be coming to an area which needs peace and tranquility."

Currently an application for a transfer of the liquor license from ALO East to Apache River has been withdrawn from the Select Board.

Marie Wickey, the administrative assistant to the Amherst Select Board said, "When Apache River applied for the transfer of the license the Select Board felt uncomfortable about the capacity designation on the license."

For that reason, the Board asked Apache River to withdraw its application and have the Zoning Board make a ruling on the capacity before they made a decision on the transfer of the liquor license, according to Wickey.

"The sentiment of a few members of the Select Board is that they don't want a bar in that area," Wickey said.

Forsyth is scheduled to appear before the Select Board on Tuesday night to tell them he will continue to own and operate Twisters, said Wickey.

■ Feminist

ttworking to bring the student body and station staff up date on women's issues.

"People need to learn the definition of feminism," Horne said. "It's political but it's not a total radical notion. Men can be feminists too."

She said one of her main goals as director is to incorporate the Women's Affairs Department into the radio station as opposed to having it operate as a separate entity.

Horne said the media project consists of four radio programs of three hour blocks devoted to women's music ranging from folk and blues to country. She also said she is trying to establish an alternative music segment.

Influential judge pleads guilty

Says he willingly sent threatening letters to ex-lover

By DONNA DE LA CRUZ
Associated Press

TRENTON, N.J. — New York state's former chief judge pleaded guilty today in federal court to sending threatening letters to kidnap his ex-lover's daughter in a bizarre case that ended his stellar legal career.

Sol Wachtler, 62, pleaded guilty to mail harassment in exchange for federal prosecutors dropping five counts of extortion.

Wachtler, reading from a prepare statement in court, apologized to his wife and four children, and also to his former lover, Joy Silverman and her 14-year-old daughter.

"I know my behavior was foreign to my 62 years on earth. I did all the acts knowingly and willfully," Wachtler said, adding he had no intention of kidnapping or harming the teen-ager.

His wife and children were in the courtroom during the hour long proceeding. They did not speak to reporters.

Wachtler told U.S. District Judge Anne E. Thompson that he is now taking drugs to control depression.

Wachtler could be sentenced to a maximum of five years in prison.

U.S. Attorney Michael Chertoff and Wachtler's attorneys agreed to recommend he serve 12 to 18 months in prison.

Given the controversial presence of the Reserve Officers Training Corps on campus and the upcoming reevaluation of the ROTC program by the Faculty Senate, Cammermeyer's visit is timely.

UMass was one of several universities which decried the exclusion of gays, lesbians and bisexuals from ROTC programs in a 1990 letter to the Pentagon. Yet, one year later, an inquiry by the UMass Academic Matters Council found ROTC to be non-discriminatory.

Several inconsistencies have prompted the Faculty Senate to reopen the investigation, according to Woolwich.

"The petition made by the Academic Matters Council deeming that ROTC wasn't discriminatory was thrown out as inconsistent by the Faculty Senate and they're doing their own investigation," Woolwich said.

Margarethe Cammermeyer will speak this Saturday at noon in the Hampden Southside Room in the Southwest Residential Area.

Much of the credit for Mo's success has to go to hitting coach "Easy" Mike Easler, who has patiently molded Mo into a force.

Also not to be overlooked are Sox outfielder Billy "Don't call me Thatcher" Hatcher, and Tony "The Wild One" Pena, who are batting .347 and .333 respectively for the spring.

Bo Jackson, artificial hip and all, will be on the Chicago White Sox opening day roster. Many thought this multi-talented athlete's two-sport career was over after he injured his hip two years ago when he was in a Los Angeles Raiders uniform, but Bo has made a miraculous comeback.

Speaking of miraculous, the expansion Colorado Rockies could very well capture a championship before the Red Sox.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Complete old business before starting new projects. A telephone call is enlightening; follow up on a strong hunch. The atmosphere improves at both home and work.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Tend to routine tasks promptly. You can look forward to making important new contacts on a business trip. Devote more time to offspring. Listen to a teen-ager's viewpoint.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Check your facts and figures before signing a binding contract. Be prepared to help with an older person's medical expenses. Romance improves when you give loved one the benefit of the doubt.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): You exude a quiet confidence today. Whether you approach others for favors through a back door or the front office, act self-assured. Good luck helps you bring family members closer together.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Money matters claim your attention today. To get what you want, deal with people behind the scenes. Those with an itch to enter a lottery should do so. Buy only one ticket!

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): You should be in your element today. Inquire about someone who has been missing for a while. Revise your vacation plans to accommodate the needs of a new relationship.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Curb a tendency to act impulsively. You want everything real quiet now to prepare for the good things coming your way. Go out tonight and play the social butterfly.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Major financial moves are best postponed. Seek a loan only if really hard pressed. Controversial topics are best avoided at social gatherings. Loves ones share a happy secret. Avoid mud.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Small businesses enjoy favorable influences. Remind someone who has owed you money for a long time. Attending and hosting social events can help your career.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Now you must be a master planner. Systems you think are in place could easily break down. Words, figures, tasks – all require careful calculation.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Whether you are at work or home today, you will generate a lot of energy. The work pace accelerates – move right along with it. A child keeps you on your toes.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Arguments could erupt over minor issues. Do not be so quick to jump to conclusions. Seek a quiet atmosphere if working on a complex project. Staying home holds special appeal tonight.

• Joel Youngblood, the only baseball player ever to play for two teams on one day?

• Dave Seiger, the mad bomber for Oklahoma during their run in 88?

• Paul Splittorf, former Royals hurler who would be perfect for the father's role in the next Revenge of the Nerds?

• Johnny Quest, the most underrated cartoon in history? An attention checker.

• Chuck Muncie, the horned-rimmed glasses wearin', coke-snortin' back in the Air Coryell system who fumbled thrice every game?

• Fred Grandy, the classico overachiever who played Gopher on The Love Boat and is seriously a senator somewhere in the United States? Are you still reading?

• David Thirdkill and Ronny Grandison, the two most nondescript forwards ever to don Celtic green?

• Tom Burgmeier, the most dependable reliever the Sox had way back when? Pretty sad, huh?

• Wayne Cashman, the old Bruin who just looked like my grandfather?

• Greg Luzinski, the bispectacled slugger for the Phils who just looked like a garbage man?

• The Big Red Censor, the red x they used to put on the screen when Blackjack Mulligan would clamp on his foes? Not a person, but great nonetheless.

• Howard Triche or Trisch, another mad bomber in the collegian ranks, this time at Syracuse?

• Rick Langford, the early '80s workhorse for the A's who pitched 28 complete games in one season?

• Billy Sims and William Andrews, two great running backs until their knees bid them adieu?

• Len Barker, the walking definition of ugly who hurled a perfect game for the Indians?

• Jack Haley, backup journeyman power forward who found fame when he was seen dirty dancing with a midget for Aerosmith's "Love In An Elevator" video?

Women's gym heads to Regionals at Ohio St.

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

It all comes down to this.

This is the sentiment of the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team as it travels to Ohio State University this weekend for the NCAA Regional Championships.

The Minutewomen, seeded fifth in the meet, are coming off one of their most productive outings of the year at the Atlantic 10 Championships, and head coach Alfie Mitchell said he hopes the team will continue to peak at the right time.

At the beginning of the season, UMass set three goals, according to Mitchell.

"One goal was to finish higher in the A-10s than we did in the previous year. We did that," said Mitchell. "The next was return the team to Regionals. It established the fact that we are a strong program and we should be one of the top teams in the Northeast year in and year out."

"I wanted us to finish as a team in the top 20 in the country, which for us would be a major move. The only way to do that is to perform well in the Regionals."

The Minutewomen said they know the importance of the Regionals, individually, and as a team.

"It's [the Regional meet] the same type of meet as A-10s, but it's a lot more intense," said senior Abby May.

"We've been working towards this meet for the entire year, and Alfie keeps telling us that we need to work harder for a higher seed in Regionals," said freshman Ruth Reeves.

"Regionals tells us how we're doing nationally, and we'd like to be in the top 20 [in the nation], so it's the biggest meet because it determines our spot," said junior Margaret Furtado, who is returning from an ankle injury that kept her out of the all around in the last few meets.

The meet itself presents the possibilities of either the team or individuals moving on to the National Championships. Members of the UMass squad have mixed feelings about the pressure of this big event.

"It's a big meet, but you try not to think of it as a big meet. If you do, you might mess up," said freshman Shaheda Keels.

"I think the whole team kind of feels pressure because we know we could do well, and we also know if we pull together as a team, we're due for a good meet," said freshman Leann Zavotka.

"I don't think it's pressure as far as nervous, as far as 'Oh my gosh, I have to perform'. I think it's pressure that we put upon ourselves every meet, because we want to do well," said senior Tammy Marshall.

Marshall, May and senior Lisa-Beth Cronen may be looked upon to keep the freshmen involved in the meet.

"I think as upperclassmen we're going to try to keep the freshmen focused, because we've all been through it before," said Marshall.

Mitchell said that he expects his top all-arounders (Marshall, Furtado, and Keels) to challenge for spots in the Nationals. Each gymnast had her own key to possible success in the meet on the road to Nationals.

Junior Margaret Furtado is back healthy and ready to lead the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team into the NCAA Regionals at Ohio State University this weekend.

"It all depends on how the day goes," said Furtado.

Keels, who has been sick recently, said "I just have to push myself. I might be tired, but it's going to come down to whether I can push myself to do well."

"Stay solid, and take one event at a time," said Marshall.

The field is comprised of Penn State, host Ohio State, New Hampshire and Pittsburgh.

Minutewomen set for return

Women's tennis ready for lift-off after a season off

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

Back from the dead.

No, that is not the title of a new horror movie, it is instead a phrase which describes the upcoming 1993 campaign for the University of Massachusetts women's tennis team.

After the 1991 season, women's tennis was cut at UMass due to budgetary problems. Now the program is back for a six match slate in 1993 due to Title IX of the NCAA which protects gender equality of collegiate sports.

The season starts today with a road trip to Mt. Holyoke College. Coaching for the Minutewomen is Judy Dixon.

Dixon has brought with her to UMass a treasure trobe of both knowledge and experience on the tennis courts. After graduating from the University of Southern California, Dixon went on to compete on the professional circuit, playing in such events as the U.S. Open and Wimbledon.

Dixon has also taught for the United States Tennis Association and provided Emmy Award nominated color commentary for PBS in 1975. Now Dixon says she is looking forward to her latest challenge as coach of the returning Minutewomen.

"It feels good to be part of a newly organized team and system," Dixon said. "It is excellent that the University is doing much for the team."

The lineup for the Minutewomen will start off with freshman Liesl Sitton manning the number one singles slot. Dixon said that Sittons' play has been a pleasant development.

"Liesl has been a real surprise for us," said Dixon. "She is a a very aggressive lefty who likes to serve and volley."

Junior Stacey Scheckner will be playing at number two singles while sophomore Lesley Watts checks in at the third slot.

At number four singles for UMass will be the team's captain, junior Pam Levine. Rounding out the singles for the Minutewomen will be sophomore Alissa Cohen at No. 5 and senior Kelly Grim at number six.

The doubles squads for the Minutewomen will be made up of Sitton and Watts at No. 1, Levine and Scheckner at number two and sophomore Mary Edwards and junior Alex Torres at No. 3.

According to Dixon the inclement weather has hurt UMass in preparation for the spring campaign but also said her squad is rearing for action.

"For all the [area] teams the weather has been terrible," said Dixon. "We've had to practice indoors either over at Mt. Holyoke or in Sunderland.

"I think they (the teams) are incredibly excited," said Dixon.

Dixon said that for the players the reinstatement meant a lot.

"I think it (the return of the program) is a dream come true for most of the team," said Dixon.

Boating tragedy shocks Indians

BEHIND HOME PLATE
by Jeff Hojlo

Athough no writer likes to begin a column on a somber note, I feel this week's space must include a mention of the worst baseball tragedy since the death in 1978 of New York Yankees catcher Thurman Munson.

About a week ago, three pitchers from the Cleveland Indians were boating on Lake Little Nellie in Winter Haven, Fla., after a family outing, and collided with a dock. Steve Olin, the team's ace reliever and Tim Crews, a newcomer to the ball club, were killed after their heads were crushed against the dock. Former Red Sox pitcher Bob Ojeda was the only survivor.

Recently, it was discovered that the driver of the boat, Crews, had a blood-alcohol level of .14, which is above the legal Fla. limit of .10. Many people might shake their head and say, "I knew it."

I say, so what if these guys had a few drinks — that still shouldn't obscure the fact that the two who died were honest men (each with three children) who still had their whole lives ahead of them. Although we, as fans, look upon athletes such as Crews, Olin and Ojeda somewhat as immortals, a tragic accident such as this reminds us all that this is not the case.

Now that you're all feeling pretty depressed right about now, let me try to perk things up a little by announcing some good news. Matt Young is gone! Matt Young is gone!

Yes, after three years of hearing that Mr. Young is going to be the second coming of Cy Young but he's "in a slump right now," the Boston Red Sox finally decided to release him and eat his very fat, $6.35 million contract. Wow, what an investment: the guy won three games in three years — that's about $2 million per win.

Speaking of our beloved Red Flops. . . ahhh, Sox, good old Butch (was he in the Dukes of Hazzard?) Hobson has his troops playing absolutely splendid baseball this spring at 9-18.

Yes, everyone loves to play for Butch but after the front office traded away the likes of Ellis Burks and Wade Boggs over the winter, the Sox were left with some big shoes to fill.

Bob Zupcic and Scott Cooper are promising players, but it remains to be seen if they can produce in the Big Dance. Forget the Curse of the Bambino — we may have to deal with the Curse of the Chicken Man from now on.

Mo Vaughn, however, is absolutely tearing the cover off the ball down in Fort Myers. After his dismal 1992 season, Mo is batting .455 with six home runs and 23 runs batted in, and showing the kind of power that many scouts said he had.

Name game – a huge success for columnist

Since I had so much fun reminiscing last week over classico sports characters, I've decided to do it once again. Here it goes.

Remember:

• Sly Williams, the forward in the NBA who reached for the Preparation H just as soon as he became a C?

• Gary Hancock, the Sox outfielder who looked looked and was supposed to be Greenwell before Greenwell? Too bad he was a career .220 hitter.

Jeff
CROFTS

• Mark McNamara, the former backup center for the Lakers who was also another backup of a different sort. He was the second string Chewbacca on Return of the Jedi?

• Tim Fox, the Patriots DB who had a lion's mane for hair?

• Swede Hansen, the rugged wrassler from the Netherlands who was a classic mediocre grappler in that he won against the scrubs but lost to the superstars.

• Billy Jo Robidioux, probably the worst opening day first baseman in Sox history?

• U.L. Washington, the early eighties shortstop for the Royals who used to chew on toothpicks during games?

• Kurt Bevacqua, the Padre who had the best last name and was featured as the Bubble Gum Blowing Champ of the majors?

• Granville Waiters, the NBA journeyman center who looked as though he was a prime candidate for Hair Club For Men at the age of 24?

• S.D. Jones, the wrassler who changed from being "Philadelphia's Favorite Son" to hailing from Antigua in the West Indies?

• Rogie Vachon, old B's goalie who was older than the game itself.

• Rafael Septien, the Cowboys kicker who had a strange, demented fettish, young children?

• Joe Charbonneau, the Cleveland Indian who was known as "Super" had one great year and opened beer bottles with his eye?

• Suen Nater, early '80s NBA rebound king?

• Kevin Howard, the tomato can that knocked Sugar Ray down during his first comeback at the Centrum?

• Outback Jack and Corporal Kirshner, the sad, pathetic wrasslers who were brought in by Vince McMahon with much publicity only to be losers? The

SPIN DOCTORS

Just go ahead now...

The Spin Doctors, currently on every station on your radio, in every magazine, and on every television show, are promoting their latest album, Pocket Full of Kryptonite. They will perform in their only New England appearance at Amherst College in LeFrak Gym this Saturday.

Widely known for their hits "Little Miss Can't Be Wrong," "Jimmy Olsen's Blues" and "Two Princes," the Spin Doctors have had high profile appearances on MTV's New Year's Ball and Late Night with David Letterman.

Spin Doctors were featured on the cover of "Rolling Stone" magazine in January. As part of last summer's H.O.R.D.E. Tour (Horizons of Rock Developing Everywhere) along with such college favorites as Phish, Blues Traveler, Bela Fleck and the Flecktones, Widespread Panic and Col. Bruce Hampton and the Aquarium Rescue Unit, Spin Doctors have emerged as the most successful of the lot.

The sold out show begins this Saturday at 8 p.m.

Take a bawdy look at gender on Cloud 9 tonight

By SHAWN McDONNELL
Collegian Staff

There's been a great diversity of opinion on how to describe Caryl Churchill's Cloud Nine, the satire of sexual stereotyping which opened last night at the Curtain. When it was first produced in New York, the only thing critics could agree on was it involved cross-dressing and time travel.

"Cloud Nine is a very playful and bawdy look at sexuality and gender roles," explains Michael Tritto, choosing his words with evident care, "through a Victorian family which travels forward in time to the 1970s."

Unusual as this premise may seem, it's in keeping with the theatre department's run of contemporary comedies. For Tritto, director of the UMass production, Cloud is a chance to entertain and offer a view on something we in the Valley have been a hearing a lot about — sexual identity.

"There's something very universal and human in all of us," Tritto explains. "Our sexual roles are all arbitrary, and it's the stereotypes that destroy us. Sex is very natural — when we repress it, that's when we get into trouble."

Cloud Nine opens on a Victorian family in colonial Africa, struggling to maintain the facades of their expected "roles" while engaged in numerous clandestine (and comical) deceits. The second act sees the family transplanted to 1979 London, closer to revealing their true selves yet still struggling with fears and stereotypes.

Reinforcing the arbitrary nature of these characters' imposed identities is deliberately non-traditional casting, which includes cross-dressing and even a White actor in the role of a Black servant.

The student cast for this piece reads like a Who's Who of UMass Theatre: Michael Lombardi (Bill and Karen), Laurie Ciarametaro (In My Abyss), Tone Nunes (Reckless), Jen Costello (Buried Child), Rob Corddry (Cat on a Hot Tin Roof), Micah Hollingsworth and Katia Anderson.

Among the distinguished production team are scenic designer Terry Beckett and costume designer Ulises Alcala, who present the show through the perspective of a child.

Cloud Nine plays tonight through Saturday and April 6-10, at 8 p.m., with a matinee Saturday at 2 p.m. Tickets are available from the Fine Arts Center Box Office, 545-2511.

Acclaimed comedienne to perform in valley

BY MELANIE DESILVA
Collegian Staff

After 11 years of being on the fringe of "acceptable" entertainment, Lea DeLaria has finally made it into the mainstream, and in the process, has made lesbian history. Tuesday night, DeLaria became the first openly gay comic to perform on a late night talk show — "Arsenio Hall."

And if you missed her like I did because the residence hall cable system doesn't give us Arsenio, don't despair.

DeLaria, who says she became an "out" comedian in order to "change the world and get laid," will grace the stage with her hilarious, critically acclaimed show called Muff Diva this Saturday and Sunday night at the Northampton Center for the Performing Arts at 8 p.m.

"This is such a big thing for the community. We are finally breaking into the mainstream," DeLaria said. Citing the unusual amount of media attention being payed to gay issues this year, such as the military ban, and the Crying Game, DeLaria deemed 1992 "the year of the queer."

The Collegian and the Arts - two great tastes in one very special newspaper.

Yet, although "Arsenio Hall" has provided DeLaria with a national audience, other late night shows have snubbed the comedian, claiming that she's just not what their audiences want to hear.

"'The Arsenio Hall Show' is very cutting edge and ground breaking," DeLaria said. "People at Letterman feel — they couch it in really friendly terms — but it's basically homophobia."

As a young comedian in the early 1980s, DeLaria faced dangerous, homophobic opposition to her "out" style of comedy in mainstream establishments. "In the beginning, if I went into a straight comedy club, they would throw things at me, like knives and bullets. Now it's different. The times are changing."

From predominantly straight college audiences, to auditoriums packed with 2,000 people, DeLaria is stunning every one with her powerful singing voice and her side-splitting comedy.

With dazzling reviews from the L.A. Times, The Boston Globe, the Philadelphia Enquirer, and the San Francisco Chronicle, with an interview on "20/20," a writing and acting position on the PBS comedy series "The World According to Us," and with the debut of her comedy and music album, Bull Dyke in a China Shop, DeLaria has put together an overwhelming portfolio.

This week, ABC cameras and reporters followed DeLaria as she toured Los Angeles, showering her with star coverage. "I was Madonna," DeLaria said, commenting on ABC's tag-along cameras. "I was Madonna with clothes on and don't you forget it."

Lea DeLaria will be performing in Muff Diva: An Evening of Jokes and Jazz, this Saturday and Sunday night at 8 p.m. at the Northampton Center for the Performing Arts. Tickets are available in advance for $10 at Prides in Northampton and the Center box office. Tickets may be purchased at the door for $12.

Sounds of the Loud Music Festival

By ADAM GOULSTON
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note: This is the last in two part profile of the Loud Music Festival.

Loud Music Festival
Pearl Street, Iron Horse, Hotel Northampton
March 26 and 27

The Iron Horse had hung its official Loud Music Festival banner, and the floor had been relieved of its tables. 8 p.m. openers Morphine had cancelled so 9 p.m. band, Northampton's own Gobblehoof, would be on stage with time in hand, right? Well. . .

Gobblehoof showed up late, kicking off festivities at 9:35 in front of a patient crowd of about 80. The venue was already behind Pearl Street and Hotel NoHo which had both begun on time.

SETH KAYE / COLLEGIAN
Swirlies' vocalist performs with restraint

So far, the Valley's been too deep for Gobblehoof to climb out of, save for short periods of time. Dinosaur Jr.'s close friends fronted by Charlie Nakajima has in the past featured drumming from Dino's Murph, though he wasn't present this Friday. While only producing two complete albums, Gobblehoof's toiled around Northampton for years.

Nakajima appeared in black pants and a snug black T-shirt which subtly revealed his girth. As he spewed rage, strands of his mop of jet black locks concealed his fu-manchu framed mug. The band looked professional and comfortable, each sporting a substantial amount of facial hair.

The sounds produced were fast, fierce and a little hard to stomach for some of the crowd. However, Dinosaur Jr.'s frontman J. Mascis, seen slinking through the concert-goers solemn as ever was no doubt pleased with his friends' performance. Gobblehoof has frequently opened up for Dino.

While revealing traces of funk, the set failed to venture far from some pretty derivative metal hooks. Nakajima's voice grew inaudible over the crunching bass and thrashing clamor. A better mix would have yielded a more effective set as the tunes sound as though they'd appeal if they could be deciphered.

The inclusion of Gobblehoof served as almost a gift to the locals like one-man moshpit John Gettier, a UMass BFA student. "I know the singer. They're a good time. They sing some weird [expletive], but I'm a weird guy." remarked Gettier with a grin and a newly sore neck.

In the NoHo streets, an even greater cross-culture than usual was evident. The impact of the Festival proved overwhelming to some such as the visiting group of (apparently) high-schoolers with the hand-held videocam who insisted I looked like "that guy from Hoosiers. What the heck was his name?"

They eagerly inquired, "What's this loud music thing? There's all these weirdos everywhere." I responded while diverting their attention to my black hi-top Chuck Taylors which further convinced them of my link to the film Hoosiers.

SETH KAYE / COLLEGIAN
Swirlies plays Pearl St. in the Loud Music Festival

As Gettier staggered out, I retreated back to the Iron Horse to catch Hypnolovewheel. The New York City foursome pulled off the most impressive set of all those I saw. Opening with "Here Comes a Headache" off their 1992 album Angel Food, the band played with all the appeal of one of their catchy hooks. Unfortunately by the conclusion of the set, an exodus to see Cell at Pearl Street had stripped the club of all but about 40 viewers.

By the time I'd finished a friendly chat with Hypno's Dan Cuddy and Dave Ramirez, rumor had begun to wear a face. Rumor could hopped on stage and impressed the record company execs with its creativity. According to Rumor, Dinosaur Jr. may play the Iron Horse later this evening. Kathy's Diner had free beer (which turned out to be American, darn, I missed it.) Rumor also told of fire in the Hotel Northampton.

My evening ended at Pearl Street with a disappointing set from Cambridge's Swirlies. The Swirlies unabashedly go for the dream guitar of My Bloody Valentine though in a recent "Alternative Press" they denied even owning a copy of MBV's landmark musical cloud Loveless. Their recording have blended such waves with Boston aggression for an appealing product.

Unfortunately, the Swirlies' Pearl Street sound was a sloppy traffic jam of distortion — too much bass, too little harmony. Possibly, one too many Americans. The "swirly" sound was buried. MBV need not worry though the Swirlies are capable of far better.

I spotted roving stage manager David White wearing a "surely there must be something else for me to do" look. White appeared unquestionably exhausted.

"I can't even speak right now. Actually it went pretty well. We had a few problems at the Iron Horse, but things around [Pearl Street] went smoothly." I asked him he he was looking forward to what was now later today. "Absolutely not! Tomorrow's gonna be even worse." He wasn't too tired to smile.

Saturday was as expected, more of the same — distortion, eccentricity, and a few gems. I got a chance to see the Hotel Northampton.

Many concert-goers probably couldn't help but ask, "Why the Hotel Northampton?" Upon stepping into the basement function room of the lush and historic hotel, I too asked why. Something about Piss Factory and the mirrored columns really clashed."

Piss Factory played a head banging set with lots of leather, unwashed hair and throat. They were probably quite satisfied playing the same gig as Gobblehoof and Cell.

The Hotel NoHo did offer moshers a unique chance to see how silly they looked (or how cool they looked depending on how many Rolling Rocks they'd downed at $2.60 a pop) on the mirrored backwall behind the band. Oh and did I mention the wall-to-wall carpeting and chandelier?

During the set, a fuse would blow and suit wearing attendees of an upstairs wedding reception would mingle. One smartly clad fellow took kindly to what these crazy kids were doing and playfully shoved a few moshers. He then turned to the guy in the leather jacket next to him as if to say, "Look, I can get away with this." Meanwhile another suit was seen lost in the moshpit. Strange.

Later that evening, Crack Sex would decorate the function room with water, corn starch, and hormones. Their set was undoubtedly the most bizarre performance I'd seen. Animal furs and lipstick would also come into play.

SETH KAYE / COLLEGIAN
Gobblehoof plays the Iron Horse

I was also treated to the appealing speed-country of Killbilly and the driving grunge of a trio called Wombat. By the late hours of Saturday, most were seated or rocking back and forth uncomfortably. I saw David White and as I was about to approach him, he was gone in a flash, hauling a bass drum, running on his second wind.

The Loud Music Festival opens a gaping door of possibilities for next year if Northampton can build on its musical stature. With all the potential for discord, it maintained a level of professionalism, organization and quality far beyond what was expected — a haven for "weirdos."

■ art

"We gave 28 single project grants through March to date," Housner said, "Over $22,000 in funding in addition to the block grants."

This amount, however, is dwarfed by the block grant total, over $150,000 last year alone. Block grants were awarded to 11 University organizations that present on-going arts programming. Galleries such as the Herter Art Gallery receive this funding over the year to enable them to continue to house various forms of art.

As Housner flips through a large pile of dog-eared posters, advertisements and old news clippings, she plucks out a small pamphlet from the pile.

"The Arts Calendar," she explains, "is intended to inform people of the [fine art] activities in the five college area."

This free bi-weekly listing can be found in the Campus Center and is also distributed through direct mail to student residencies on all five campuses, to faculty and staff. In addition to the calendar, the Council also puts out a monthly poster that highlights some of the events in the area. Neil O'Brien, an undergraduate staff member who is the calendar coordinator, designed the poster to not only include events, time and location, but also a map so there can be no excuses for not going. Housner feels that this poster will encourage people to get out and go see what the fuss is about.

Besides these events, the Council also maintains several public art sites around campus. The Hampden Court Sculpture Garden located in Southwest along with the Civility Mural located directly outside of Campus Center are two of these such sites.

The five-college area is saturated with fine art opportunities for everybody. The Arts Council works hard in their cramped office to bring all of this to the area, stop and take notice of what's being offered.

Write for Arts & Living. It's just the thing to do!

Where does UMass art come from?

By GREG AYMIE
Collegian Staff

Located amidst the Bunsen burners and physics experiments of Hasbrouck Hall, one would hardly expect to find any fine art, let alone an entire office devoted to the placement of art right here on campus, but that's exactly what you'll find there. Behind door No. 203, a six-member group including Felice Thoma, director of publicity and outreach, and Marlene Housner, the program coordinator, make up the Arts Council staff.

The Arts Council was founded in 1966 and originally presented most of the fine art events at the University. When the Fine Arts Center opened in 1975 and assumed this role, the Council changed its focus towards grant giving, arts education, public arts programming and arts information services.

"We try to make art accessible for everybody," says Housner.

One look around the tiny office and it is obvious that Housner appreciates art herself. The room is covered by a rainbow of posters from previous projects as well as miniature scale models of current exhibits and Housner's own personal art.

Housner's private office is located in the corner of the room behind a divider. Reclining behind her cluttered desk, Housner explains the difference between the two grants that the Council offers: single project grants and block grants.

The single project grants are awarded on a one-time basis to specific arts related events. Recipients last year ranged from Chi Omega to the annual performance of "Alive with Dance," a concert of original student choreographed works.

There are six cycles throughout the year in which to apply for this grant. The next deadline is Friday, April 23. This deadline includes projects for next fall. To apply for these grants, an application provided by the council must be completed. This application is then reviewed by the council and a vote is taken on whether or not to accept it. The 18-member voting council includes six undergraduate students, six faculty members, three graduate students, two members of the staff and one alumnus.

The council derives most of its funding from a portion of the Arts Fee paid by all UMass students. This money enables the council to give out the amount of grants they do.

Hard-liners in Russia knock U.S. aid policy

By DEBORAH SEWARD
Associated Press

MOSCOW — Hard-line Russian lawmakers are criticizing President Boris Yeltsin's weekend summit with President Clinton and warning that Western aid is aimed at the wrong target.

"How will America help us? With more promises? It is very sad President Clinton is trying to help our president," said Gen. Anatoly Kortunov, a member of the hard-line "Fatherland" faction in the Congress of People's Deputies.

"He should help the Russian people," said Kortunov, echoing a common criticism that U.S. policy toward Moscow has been concentrated too much on one person — first Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev and now Yeltsin.

This criticism comes at a time when Clinton and his aids are stressing that key elements in his aid package are designed to reach the Russian people directly, not the Russian government. U.S. officials

WASHINGTON — Democrats completed congressional action today on the outlines of President Clinton's $496 billion deficit-reduction plan, vowing to reverse what they called "the most irresponsible fiscal policy" in the nation's history.

The plan cleared the Senate on a 55-45 vote. The House had passed it on a 240-184 roll call Wednesday night. Not a single Republican voted for the measure in either chamber.

Clinton, meeting with congressional leaders at the White House yesterday morning, said he was pleased with the Senate vote. Asked if he was worried about the stimulus package that is still pending, he said, "I think we can pass it. We'll need to keep working on it."

Lawmakers will decide later this year whose taxes will be raised and what spending programs will be restrained to make the deficit cuts a reality. Clinton's plan envisions hefty income tax increases on the well-off, a major energy tax and deep reductions in military spending.

"A vote against this president's package . . . is simply a vote for doing nothing . . . going down the same road we have been going down for the past 12 years . . . for continuing economic stagnation . . . for ever-escalating deficits," said Sen. Janes Sasser, D-Tenn., chairman of the Senate Budget Committee.

Clinton's plan, Sasser said, will turn around "12 years of the most irresponsible fiscal policy . . . in the history of our country."

Sen. Pete Domenici of New Mexico, senior Republican on the Budget Committee, labeled the plan the largest tax increase in history. "If we don't get the deficit under control with $272 billion of new taxes, what's next? Another round of taxes?"

"The greatest of all April Fool's jokes is that this bill will not create jobs . . . will not reduce the deficit," Domenici said.

Only two Democratic senators — Rickard Shelby of Alabama and Bob Kruegger of Texas — voted against the plan. Twelve House Democrats opposed it.

It will take additional action in the House and Senate later this year to actually raise any taxes, just as further votes will be needed to implement the spending restraints envisioned in the budget outline. This blueprint merely sets targets for Congress to follow: it does not require the president's signature.

The deficit-reduction plan is built into a proposed $1.5 trillion budget for the 1994 fiscal year, which begins Oct.

Doctors describe plight of Palestinian women

By FELICIA COUSINS
Collegian Correspondent

Palestininan and Israeli women's activism was the focus of the lecture given by Dr. Salwa Najjab-Kahtib and Dr. Ruchana Marton in the Campus Center Auditorium Wednesday night.

Both speakers are from the Women's Health Project which is a vehicle connecting Palestinian women with women world-wide in search of self determination, according to organizers. The objectives of the project are to provide antenatal, post-natal, family planning, gynecology and cancer screening at an affordable cost for Palestinian women and children.

The lecture "marks the day Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin ordered the closing off of the Gaza Strip," said Najjab-Kahtib.

Najjab-Kahtib said "ethnic cleansing" has made adequate health care as a basic human right to the Palestinian people, especially women, virtually impossible.

Najjab-Kahtib's pamphlet described Palestinian women as suffering from the social, psychological and physical effects of constant military surveillance, separation from family and friends, deportations and imprisonment. In refugee camps, living conditions are overcrowded and unsanitary, she said.

The infant mortality rate in the occupied territory is substantially higher than that of Jordan, Israel and other neighboring Arab states.

Dr. Ruchama Marton, an Israeli Jew born in Palestine, is the founder of the Association of Israel Palestinian Physicians for Human Rights. The assocation is struggling against the manifestations of Israeli occupation in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

UMass grad raffles own house

Proceeds to benefit promising high school students

By TRACY MONAHAN

"Kids have no peer role models," Greenfield resident Joseph Pellegrino said. He said he believes this is a cynical era, an era of non-heroes.

In order to change this, Pellegrino said he is going to raffle off his house and use the proceeds to give $1,000 scholarships to high school students who write stories about personal successes they've had in their communities.

Pellegrino is a former UMass School of Education undergraduate who attended the University from 1984-1990. He left school and bicycled across Europe with Sylvia Diaz, a former UMass communications major from 1987-1990.

While bicycling across Europe, Pellegrino said he and Diaz came up with the idea. He said their plan is to give money to kids who are achieving their dreams.

"Kids don't have to not be powerful, they can make a difference," Pellegrino said.

Pellegrino said the stories will be published in conjunction with the Folkite Magazine, the publication of the Pioneer Valley Folklore Society, the organization sponsoring Pellegrino and Diaz.

Pellegrino said he will run pilot editions in the fall and spring. He said he hopes to be picked up by a national sponsor, like Nike.

Diaz and Pellegrino became interested in teenagers after working with the New England Research Institute, a group that researches high school students.

They originally applied for a grant from Ben and Jerry's, but were turned down, according to Pellegrino.

Pellegrino said he wants to stress that kids can do things for the community without sacrificing fun.

"The idea is [for teenagers] to do good for the community and themselves and be adventurous," he said. "The end all is kid empowerment."

Pellegrino said the tickets for the house raffle are $150 and only 1200 will be sold. He also said he will receive the original investment for the house and the rest of the money will go for the youth scholarships.

According to Pellegrino, the winner will get the whole house "free and clear" with no costs, back taxes, mortgages, liens, closing costs or lawyers fees. He said he will assist in easing relations between the new owner and the family that already lives in the house.

He said he "feels really good" about it and "knows it will work." If it doesn't work, Pellegrino said he will try something else.

The house, which is a two-family located in Charlemont, will be raffled off April 10.

Alleged terrorists arrested in Midwest

By ED SCHAFER
Associated Press

ST. LOUIS — Four alleged members of the Abu Nidal terrorist group have been charged in America's heartland with plotting to kill Jews and blow up an Israeli embassy. One of them fatally stabbed his daughter, shouting "Die, my daughter, die!" so she wouldn't reveal his secret, the FBI said.

That was a sharp difference from the motive offered by state prosecutors who convicted the father in 1991. They had said the killing resulted from a clash of cultures between her fundamentalist Muslim parents and the westernized girl, 16-year-old Palestina "Tina" Isa.

The indictments unsealed Thursday are believed to be the first of suspected Abu Nidal members in the United States, FBI Agent James W. Nelson said.

The Abu Nidal organization was described by a State Department report in 1989 as the world's most dangerous terrorist group. Abu Nidal was the name taken by the group's leader, Sabbry al-Banna.

Among the group's acts, the report said, was the killing of 21 people in the bombing of an Istanbul, Turkey, synagogue in 1986.

"The stated purpose of Abu Nidal is to kill Jews anywhere and everywhere," Nelson said.

The indictments accused the four of running a rack-

State Police Breakup Whitmore Sit-in; Carry off 34

Throughout the afternoon the group prepared for the evening vigil. A large supply of food was purchased and instructions on courses of action when the police came were given at periodic intervals.

The protest against all recruiting began Monday when the Committee brought a demand to Dean Field asking that a public debate with the Dow Chemical recruiter be held before he met with interviewees. One member of the committee stated the debate would enable those being interviewed "to understand what kind of company they would be working for."

Dean Field told the group "It is my attempt to dissuade you from remaining.

Several minutes later the state police, in full riot equipment entered the lobby and carried the students out in a swift operation. Each student was carried by two policemen. In response to a manner which some present believe to be overly forceful, several authorized spectators and demonstrators shouted at police to "take it easy, take it easy, they want to go". A State Police officer supervised the operation with the same warning to "take it easy".

Health officials say smoking on the rise in U.S.

By LAURAN NEERGAARD
Associated Press

ATLANTA — Just one year after smoking reached a record low, Americans stopped kicking the habit and more Blacks and women started smoking, federal health officials reported Thursday.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention blamed discount cigarettes and $3.9 billion in tobacco advertising for the reversal, and called for cigarette tax increases.

"We need to look at bold steps because we're not making the progress we need to make," said Dr. Michael Eriksen, director of the CDC's Office of Smoking and Health.

The figures for 1991, the latest for which statistics are available, mark the end of 25 years of steady decreases in smoking. And they mean the United States probably won't meet a national health objective: only 15 percent of Americans smoking by the year 2000.

"It's taken us off our year-2000 pace," Eriksen said. "At the current rate, we'll only reach 19 percent."

Discount cigarettes, which can cost as much as $1 less per pack than national brands, and promotions such as free samples and $5-off coupons for cartons make smoking more affordable, Eriksen said.

"That is contributing to people continuing to smoke who in the past otherwise would have quit," he said.

The CDC found that 25.7 percent of Americans — 46.3 million people — smoked in 1991. In 1990, 25.5 percent smoked, the lowest level since the CDC began counting in 1955.

Because the difference between the two years is less than half a percentage point, the CDC said the nation's smoking habits leveled off in 1991.

But more blacks — 29.2 percent versus 26.2 percent in 1990 and more women — 23.5 percent versus 22.8 percent — smoked in 1991, it said.

The CDC couldn't explain the increase among women except to point to advertising targeting women's fears of weight gain if they stop smoking.

eteering enterprise that included the 16-year-old girl's death and conspiring to kill Jews, blow up the Israeli Embasssy in Washington, and buy weapons and smuggle money to other Abu Nidal members.

It said the four also planned to kill anyone within the group or outside who could expose the plots. The girl's death was the only slaying alleged to have been carried out.

The indictment was issued Wednesday but remained sealed until the defendants were in custody. They are Tina Isa's father, Zein Isa, 61, who is on death row, Saif Nijmeh, 32, arrested at his St. Louis County home, Luie Nijmeh, 29, arrested at his Miamisburg, Ohio, home, and Tawfig Musa, 43, arrested in Racine, Wis. All four are of Palestinian descent.

Musa and the Nijmehs were being held without bond pending hearings next week. They face life in prison and fines if convicted.

FBI agents investigating whether Zein Isa was involved in the PLO had bugged his family's St. Louis apartment and captured on audio tape his daughter's killing there in November 1988.

The chilling seven-minute tape and other testimony indicated that the dispute focused on the girl taking a job and having a Black boyfriend.

The girl's mother, Maria Isa, who is Brazilian, allegedly held the girl down while the father stabbed her. Amid sounds of a struggle and Tina's screams, Zein Isa could be heard shouting in Arabic to the girl, "Die! Die quickly! Die, my daughter, die!"

Workout for Hope

On April 4, 1993, some of Northampton's top physical fitness experts will team up with America for the Fifth Annual Workout for Hope — Aerobics Against AIDS, to be held in Northampton at the Pearl Street Nightclub from 12 p.m. to 3 p.m.

The event will be held to raise money for AIDS research at the City of Hope National Medical Center and Beckman Research Institute.

Teams from local fitness organizations will lead participants through intervals of various styles of aerobic exercise. Prior to the event, participants get friends, family and co-workers to be sponsors while they work out.

Scientists receive $210,000 from Johnson & Johnson

Johnson & Johnson has recently awarded a three-year grant worth $210,000 to two scientists at the University to study the applications of biodegradable plastics and rubber-like polymers called elastomers.

The grant's recipients were biochemist R. Clinton Fuller and polymer scientists Robert W. Lenz. The two have worked together since 1985 making and studying properties of plastics and elastomers that are both biocompatible and biodegradable in the body.

UMass to host 1993 Foreign Language Day

The University will host the second annual 1993 Massachusetts Foreign Language Day for high school and community college students on April 14, from 9:30 a.m. to 3:30 p.m.

The event is sponsored by the University and is the only in the state. The event showcases the opportunities for foreign language study at UMass.

Participating schools may send up to four students, preferably sophomores and juniors, accompanied by one teacher.

German Films to be Screened

The Department of Germanic Languages and Literature will present a series of films banned from the former East Germany during the first three Thursdays in April.

The film "Spur der Steine," or "Traces of the Stones," will be shown on April 6 at 7:30 p.m. in Thompson 102. "Berlin um die Ecke," or "Berlin Around the Corner," will be shown on April 13 at 7:30 p.m. in Thompson 106.

The final film, "Jahrgang '45," or "Born in '45," will be shown on April 20 at 7:30 p.m.

All films are in German with English subtitles.

Death Camp Liberator to Speak

Paul Parks, who served with a segregated U.S. Army unit that worked to liberate Nazi concentration camps, will be speaking about his experiences Thursday, April 8 at 8 p.m. in 101 Campus Center.

Parks, former state secretary of education, will discuss the service of African-Americans during World War II and the long-standing relationship between Blacks and Jewish-Americans.

Parks has lectured and written a number of books about education and racial inequality. Currently a registered civil engineer, he holds a doctorate in education from the University.

Abortion Conference to be held

The seventh annual "Fight for Abortion Rights and Reproductive Freedom" will be held on April 2-4 at Hampshire College. The conference will focus on women's health care issues, including abortion and reproductive freedom both in the United States and internationally.

The schedule includes a talk on "Breaking Silences: An Abortion Speak-Out," at 7:30 p.m. Friday. On Friday, April 3, from 9:30 am. to 12:30 p.m., there will be an event focusing on "Speaking out for Reproductive Freedom." There will also be workshops on reproductive rights topics from 2 p.m. to 5:30 p.m.

Students campaign for bill to save endangered species

By KENDRA WILLETT
Collegian Staff

A four-week campaign organized by the Massachusetts Public Research Group is attempting to put pressure on Congress to re-authorize the endangered species bill.

The bill protecting endangered species is one of the oldest pieces of environmental legislation in the United States.

According to Julie Farb, the MassPIRG campus organizer, the goal of the campaign is to have Congress reissue a stronger bill which will include seven new aspects.

The seven new proposals include stronger efforts to recover species from the brink of destruction, protect the eco-systems on which the endangered species depend and ensure funding for habitat conservation.

"We are advocating that these provisions become part of the bill," Farb said.

The MassPIRG organization has been encouraging students to participate in the campaign by setting up a table in the Campus Center Concourse, where people sign letters to Congress urging members to consider the proposals.

A benefit concert was also held which included four bands. The admission price included a letter to Congress and the postage for one stamp.

So far 325 letters have been written, and the goal of MassPIRG is to send at least 400 to the members who will be voting, according to Farb.

"There are five to 10 million endangered species today," Farb said. "And at least one species becomes extinct everyday. This is why the current bill is not enough."

To wrap up the campaign on April 7, MassPIRG will join efforts with the Massachusetts Audobon Society and Greenpeace during a press conference to be held here on campus.

Farb encouraged students to attend and listen to four guest speakers who will explain the efforts of the campaign.

"Private interest will always have the dollars to destroy protective legislation like the Endangered Species Act," said Mitchell Blum, the co-ordinator for the endangered species project.

"And we want students to realize that through direct action like writing a letter, they can influence political and social change as well."

According to literature distributed by MassPIRG, there are many myths about the Endangered Species Act which need to be recognized.

Myths such as the act blocking economic development, and not taking into account the human cost of species protection, are all recognized and argued in the literature.

MassPIRG addresses these concerns by arguing that fewer than one percent of economic proposals have actually been stopped because of endangered species, and that the human cost of business is higher than the protection of a species.

Ed Korza: a friend to the Greeks

By HOPE TAYLOR
Collegian Correspondent

Ed Korza, director of Greek Affairs and assistant dean of students, said he has befriended over 1,200 students and is a champion of students rights.

Korza said his job gives him a sense of kinship toward the Greek area and provides members with guidance and support, although he is not a fraternity member.

He works closely with chapter presidents, and through a series of workshops, emphasizes goals in which each chapter and member strives for academic, career and personal development.

Korza said he feels he is the link between the Greek area and the University.

"In an area where members and leaders are constantly changing, our office is an oasis of stability and support," he said.

Korza said he also handles discipline problems that arise in the Greek area. He said he believes there is always room for improvement and the toughest problem right now is the area's "obsession with alcohol."

He said he is trying to set up a seminar on drinking responsibly.

"Stupid decisions end in stupid results," Korza said. "But a Greek member is more likely to be careful because it is not just the person's reputation at stake. It's a whole house's charter."

Earlier in Korza's career as director of the Greek area, two fraternities that had been sent off campus, Theta Chi and Alpha Tau Gamma, were reinstated.

Korza said he is no stranger to championing student causes. A former public school teacher, Korza joined the University staff in 1985 as the assistant director of the Diversified Education Access and Outreach Program, where he could set promising low income high school students on the right track for success, he said.

Korza served as head of the Student Activities Office for the 1991-1992 academic year, before resuming his duties as director of Greek Affairs.

He said he enjoys seeing chapters excel. "Father Quigley [of the Newman Center] loves the Greeks," he said. "They raise thousands of dollars for him every year in his phone-a-thon."

Korza said the main issue the Greek area must face is changing its image. He said the bad image of Greeks is based on highly publicized antics people characterize as the "norm" for the Greek area.

"The only way to improve the attitudes toward the Greek area is to keep their names out of the papers for 20 years — a whole generation," he said.

Korza said the Greek area does have an "unsavory" reputation, but he believes it is made up of good students.

"I wouldn't fight for a group that I thought was inherently bad," he said. "From this Greek area is going to arise some successful leaders."

Low standards

With Chancellor Richard O'Brien going off to pasture in a number of months, UMass has been working (somewhat) diligently in finding a replacement. Which direction the University takes in hiring a new chancellor will speak volumes about what direction it takes in improving this declining and depressed campus.

This makes the tour of the three finalists even more distressing, especially that of Claudia Mitchell-Kernan.

Mitchell-Kernan, who has had 20 years' experience, pledges to work on campus climate at UMass. She duly noted that UCLA worked on a more diverse student climate and now their freshman class is half minority.

This is the issue many students should be most concerned about. When I entered the University, the campus was eight to 10 percent minority. At this point, minorities make up 10 percent of the school. By contrast, the United States is approximately 23 percent minority.

Michael
MORRISSEY

The trick will be to raise minority admissions without lowering standards for the school. If Mitchell-Kernan, or any other candidate can do this, it should obviously be a strong reason for his or her hiring.

Many students are praying that UMass' accreditation doesn't fall further than it already has. A diploma from UMass is already best suited for a bird cage liner or floormat on a car, and if admission standards drop any lower, we might as well all transfer to the New England Tractor Trailer School.

What is most distressing is the track record of some of the "fringe applicants" who have already been accepted in the past few years. In the last year, two UMass students or former students were involved in murder.

Obviously, not every minority is a criminal, and not all crimes at UMass are committed by minorities. The point is, if we lower our admission standards further, we will allow students less serious about academics. That is dangerous.

Last May, Alex Delgado was implicated in a murder. Delgado was a student in continuing education, and authorities stormed his residence hall with guns the night they arrested him. Recently, James Cyr, Jr. was arrested in the death of UMass student Tara Hartnett. Cyr was a former student at the University who dropped out.

The point is, both were questionable students who allegedly committed serious crimes. If Mitchell-Kernan is thinking about lowering standards even more, should we expect crime to soar even higher? Should we expect to be raped, maimed or killed if we stay at UMass?

Minority admissions at UMass should be equal to the percentage of the country's. This is a transgression which has been allowed to slide for too long. Climate between races should also be improved. But the way to do it is not to admit just any non-White person who wants to go here.

It is ironic that while University President Michael Hooker looks at the university system of California as the system to aspire to, Mitchell-Kernan has almost two decades of experience at UCLA. That makes her a front runner in my mind. It also helps, here at Berkeley-East, that she's a minority, a woman and she kept her maiden name to boot.

Let us hope there is a way for the next chancellor to get stronger, brighter and better students than ever before, and not just have a 50 percent minority freshman class. If they simply open the flood gates, we all could drown.

It's spring — time to play in the mud

I have seen it for myself. It is a spring like no other.

This winter, Mother Nature gave us her worst; storm after storm blew through Massachusetts, piling up snow to your knees and bringing temperatures cold enough to keep it on the ground for weeks.

But what is often forgotten as folks long for lazy summer afternoons is the fun and excitement of a real spring.

Take a walk outside and find it for yourself.

Jeff
McKENZIE

Put on an old pair of shoes and wool socks and some beat-up shorts and a sweatshirt. Go to a place where you know there is a trickling stream that bounces through the woods, over stones and under logs.

When you get there, it will not be the same giggling brook that you remember from last summer. In fact, you will hear it some ways off.

What you will find is a racing, wild torrent, running hard and cold and clear. If you could walk across it before, now you'll have to jump. You may even have to get a running start, but don't slip in the snow; its about a foot and a half deep in the woods. Don't forget those wool socks, like my friend Ed did — his feet were cold.

Anything bigger than a summer's running jump will be raging whitewater now, and you will need a bridge or second pair of wool socks. Fallen trees make nice bridges, but watch out for the ones without bark, they're real slippery. Ed and I found a tree that had fallen across into another tree and allowed us to go hand over hand upside-down and climb down the tree on the other side. That was kind of scary, but fun.

Once you get across, continue through the snow to a place where the tree cover thins out and lets the sun shine through. Probably there will be some nice mud there. Have a friend check it for hidden rocks or branches, take a step back, and dive in. Make sure to get a lot on your face and in your hair, that will be good.

Don't worry about cleaning off. Soon you will come to another wild river that wasn't there before. Just walk into it and submerge yourself into the icy rush. Let the current strip the mud from your body, and don't forget to dunk your face. You will emerge clean and invigorated.

While you are doing all of this, make sure to look around and listen to birds and other animals. Smell the forest at its peak of olfactory delight. Act like this is your first day on Earth and say, "I never realized it was so beautiful," or some other reasonable cliche.

Then cover yourself with fallen pine branches and continue on. Pick a warm, sunny day, perhaps one this weekend, so you can stay out for at least two hours. If you know of some mountainous terrain, perhaps in Sunderland or Leverett or Shutesbury, go there. Trails along the power lines are looking particularly tasty right now, as they receive a healthy dose of sun with intermittent shade.

If possible, ride your bike there or just ride it the whole way; you will be a better person for it, as well as tired.

The final step in knowing the fun and excitement of spring is riding back through campus, covered with mud and snow and ice water. People will laugh at you and you will think they are smiling because they are so happy.

Say "hello" to everyone you see, even if they don't look at you first. This will make everyone smile and all can enjoy the pleasures of a true New England spring.

Fat is like another insulting 'f' word

Please allow me to speak my mind about something that has bothered me for awhile, something that has caused me to question again and again — if even in my own mind — what some of this country's values are stressing.

While entering my dormitory a few days ago, I saw a simple advertisement that gained the attention of passersby with one bold-faced word: "FAT?" It went on to tell people, after perhaps insulting those it was intended to reach, how to remedy this "evil" in their lives.

Troy L.
MERRICK

Now, I consider myself to be in pretty good shape, I guess, but I was still rather offended by this cruel play on a person's mentality regarding their physical being. I wonder if the author considered just how hurt, and rightfully so, some people would be after such a comment.

Is everybody different? Does a bear... well. So yes, we all carry our own unique traits around with us every minute of every day, and it's about goddamned time every soul on this seemingly hate-filled planet bought into that.

Seem that even after all the debates, articles, Oprah episodes and public reminders there is still more than an inkling of unacceptance of people with characteristics other than our own. And this time, the category is the overweight.

I personally apologize to all the overweight men and women who may or may not have taken the flyer as another jab at their physical makeup, and inevitably their perhaps already weak psyche when it comes to their bodies.

There is a distinct misconception that slim and sexy is the only way to be, and to carry extra pounds or not fit into a size 10 pair of Jordaches dooms one to hell. Fat is looked upon as another "f" word, and one too often spoken without regard to its connotations, which go far beyond its denotational meaning.

Just about every female celebrity has her own "workout video" with images of sweating heavies (mostly women, for some reason) and a message of "you don't want this to happen to you." Thousands of products and commercials depict sculpted, attractive models as if they are the finest of the fine and if you can't be just like them, then you're missing the good life.

I'm sick of seeing people get paid more in one hour just for a pretty face and a hard body than I'll make in a year scrubbing plates at the D.C.

I had a friend in high school who had a self esteem that hung to his feet. It wasn't because he was a jerk or that he had gone out and earned his unpopularity in any way, shape or form. The problem went no further than his waistline.

But he was my friend just the same. It never fazed me that he was overweight. By the way, I used "was" because just before we graduated, he killed himself. I suppose it was stuff from mere taunting and mere teasing to malicious insults and actions against him that outweighed the value of life. And a worthwhile life at that.

I don't know. I'm glad I looked past what others couldn't and gave the guy a chance. But hey, I guess that junk will never cease totally. Immaturity doesn't go down without a fight.

There have never been discussions of racial distress, sexual orientation issues, women's rights and what have you on this campus. However, there are individuals in all these categories with weight problems. And they know it; they've lived with it perhaps all their lives, and they don't need to hear it from some heartless putz who claims to have the "key to freeing them from the very prison of their bodies."

So I ask whoever drew up that "oh-so-cutesy" ad to, if he or she wants to help other people deal with their lives, to join the Peace Corps or something — someplace where their opinion is needed and asked for.

Marijuana users challenge stereotypes and stigmas

This is in response to Steven L. Cohen's column [Collegian, March 29]. I have tried to avoid responding to every attack and libel about pot smokers that has been printed in the Collegian this semester, but Mr. Cohen brought up a point we have been hearing a lot of lately. The argument that the 2 to 1 victory of the Hemp Initiative will hurt UMass' reputation is one I wish to take issue with.

We in the Cannabis Reform Coalition believe this statement of support for legalization of marijuana will be seen by millions of Americans as a brave stand against the forces of intolerance. If some people chose to view this victory as something to be ashamed of or angry about, they must understand that their reaction is due to personal prejudice against those who alter their consciousness in nonconformist ways, rather than any scientific fact.

Furthermore, Mr. Cohen implies that the Hemp Initiative will make it more difficult for all students to get jobs because employers will not respect a school which stands up for personal self-determination. In response I give you a recent report from a 10-year study by the National Bureau of Economic Research in New York which showed that young marijuana users earn higher wages than non-users, that they had more job satisfaction and were often the most inquisitive and talented people at the workplace.

Mr. Cohen is just the latest in a series of ignorant and sanctimonious editorialists who have used their poison pens to hurl abuse at the most peaceful members of our community, not realizing that they are acting as the government's stooges by distracting people from the real causes of America's problems with their prohibitionist rhetoric.

Noted scholar Thomas Szaz, M.D., stated in his book, Ceremonial Chemistry, "Dangerous drugs, users, and pushers are the scapegoats of our modern, secular therapeutically imbued societies; and... the ritual persecution of these pharmacological and human agents must be seen against the historical backdrop of the ritual persecution of other scapegoats, such as witches, Jews, and madmen."

Let it be known that such persecution shall no longer go unchallenged. We, the pot smokers of UMass and our supporters, shall not allow those who would stigmatize and stereotype us to go unanswered.

We love you

Usually, we just fill odd spaces like this with a friendly reminder that we live for letters.

Today, there's more:

Thanks.

Our mailbox seems to be breeding letters. It's really fun, like raising Sea Monkeys — we're never bored.

The letters are great, and we're trying to cram as much into a page as possible. It may take us a few days to print your letter, but we're working on it.

Type it up, put your name, phone number and address on it, and bring it down to 113 Campus Center basement.

Moderate reform is necessary to end suffering in Russia

For over a year, there has been overt conflict in Russia over the nature and pace of economic reforms. On one side, President Boris Yeltsin and his supporters in the Congress of People's Deputies (the Russian parliament) advocate pervasive and immediate privatization of nearly all state-owned industry. Yeltsin's backers are significantly less than a majority, but nevertheless constitute a substantial voting bloc.

On the other side are two basic groups in Congress: moderate reformers and conservatives. Moderates agree that privatization and free markets are worthy goals, but they believe change should come more slowly and in a controlled manner. Conservatives oppose the scope of Yeltsin's reforms, and some favor a return to central planning of the economy, but by and large their agenda mostly has been obstruction of Yelstin rather than establishment of any particular program.

There are good reasons why some state enterprises should be privatized, but there remains the question of how quickly to privatize, and what structure of privatized industry to promote. If the state abandons its enterprises cold turkey to the unchecked free markets, there will be many plant closures and widespread unemployment. The reforms that have already occurred, both in Russia and other countries, like Poland and Hungary, that have moved to markets from centrally-planned economies, are testimony to the human suffering resulting from hurried reform.

The important point to remember is that a majority of Congress favors some form of economic liberalization. Yeltsin has been unable to win a majority for his radical proposals and as a result has accused the Congress of being reactionary and Communist. Two weeks ago, he declared that he had signed a decree claiming emergency powers. The Constitutional Court ruled the decree, which Yeltsin had yet to release, unconstitutional, setting the stage for impeachment in an emergency session of Congress.

Jonah
GELBACH

The decree Yeltsin issued was devoid of any claims to extraconstitutional power. It appeared a compromise would be reached on a referendum, the issue that had touched off the crisis. In a surprise move, the Congress attempted to unseat both Yeltsin and Ruslan Khasbulativ, Congress chairman and Yeltsin's chief rival. In Yeltsin's case, the Congress failed by just over 70 votes, and in Khasbulatov's, by 178. The Congress approved a referendum for April 25, and Yeltsin is threatening a rival plebiscite for the same day. It is a common misconception that the Congress is dominated by hard-line Communists. That one third of the deputies voted to oust Khasbulatov and Yeltsin's opponents failed to win a majority for his removal show that notion to be unfounded.

More fundamentally, the U.S. media seem not to care that Russia's constitution makes Yeltsin's power contingent on congressional consent. Some argue that since it dates to the Brezhnev days of the Soviet Union, the constitution is illegitimate. Yet they apparently forget the heady days of August 1991, when Yeltsin reveled in the support of these same deputies as they augmented his power at the expense of then-Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev. No one in the West yelped about the Congress' illegitimacy, and Yeltsin hardly complained about his new-found political authority.

What has happened in the last several months is that Yeltsin's economic reforms, partly forced on him by aid agencies like the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, coupled with U.S. failure to provide economic aid, and partly his own folly, have worsened conditions in Russia.

The result has been widespread opposition to the pace of reform, and his mis-playing of the political situation has caused greater opposition to reform in general. Yeltsin made an unconstitutional grab at arbitrary authority and pulled back when he saw he couldn't win the ensuing fight. At the same time, conservative parliamentarians lack the strength to drive him out, and the result has been a stalemate. Unless both sides swallow their pride and dictatorial instincts and choose to work with more moderate reformers, the Russian people can only expect more suffering.

NOW practices genocide

Last Sunday, Patricia Ireland, the president of the National Organization of Women, spoke at UMass as part of her tour across the state and nation. She was sponsored by the NOW's Massachusetts chapter and the Everywoman's Center.

Cara Lee
BIRCH

Her main objective was to convince women they had the right to have power in the United States government and that this would change the political climate and policies now being revised by the Clinton administration. She argued for a partnership with American men by stating that she wanted "only half the power in Congress." However, this is a dubious reminder of the age old traditional chant of "change the face but not the fortress."

The rhetoric of "women's rights" as presented by NOW is only a cloak for "women's right" to participate in a repressive government that exploits, murders and rapes poor people here and more specifically, the whole of Third World nations. This assertion for women's power in America is, in essence, an attempt to have equal representation in a nation that produces warfare abroad.

NOW states that they are "actively involved in every issue relating to full equality for women in our society." However, they clearly contradict themselves by preaching one thing and practicing another in three key areas.

First, they preach that "sisterhood is global." If sisterhood is global, then why do they define progress as getting a porcelain toilet in the White House? Would they define progress as Third World nations having the right to arm themselves? No. Patricia Ireland stated on Sunday that NOW did not have a position on a nation's right to defend themselves, nor did NOW have a position on Palestinian women being executed in the Gaza Strip. In essence, she saw Western women sharing a toilet as "sisterhood," but never would "sisterhood" include economic and military support for Third World women who are sacrificing their bodies, their children, and their lives for national liberation. NOW simply preaches sisterhood but practices murder.

Second, NOW preaches for reproductive rights for the young and the poor. In practice, however, they have not lifted a finger against sterilization abuse on indigenous reservations and inner cities in the United States. They have also never organized to oppose government-sponsored tests which force women to have Norplant and the AIDS virus injected into them. Third World women have become guinea pigs for Western women. Affluent American women have reproductive rights while poor women often don't have the right to have children, or even the right to live. This time, they preach for rights but practice repression.

They preach anti-racism. Along with this concept, they argue for "colorful" seats in Congress. However, this country is founded on the annihilation of indigenous people, and the exploitation of African-Americans. Since it also flourishes through colonial warfare in Asia, Africa and Latin America, NOW supports unjustified murder. In wanting to wear their husbands pants, white middle-class women and NOW preach for "equality in Congress," and in this attempt for equality, they practice genocide.

NOW is an organization that only wants a piece of the American pie. For too long, Americans have been brainwashed into fighting for equality through such organizations. It is a disgrace that our campus and our own Everywoman's Center would sponsor such an insulting event.

Demonstration broke the silence

I am writing in response to an article regarding Friday's demonstration by the Women's Action Coalition [Collegian, March 29]. In a society so often silent about violence against women, WAC deserves credit for breaking that silence, if only for two short hours, by handing out articles to morning commuters about the murder of Tara Hartnett and information about where women can get help. It was a basic action, as were its goals. We wanted people to be aware of this most recent murder, and for women to know there are places to contact if they need help. If one woman in need has the number to a crisis hotline that she did not have before, that is enough of an accomplishment.

That was not the only achievement of this simple demonstration. Women also began to know what it feels like to take action about issues that affect their lives. Without this first realization, how can we move forward? I felt silenced after the murder of Tara Hartnett, but planning and attending this demonstration created space for me to give expression to my fear and rage. I believe other women had a similar experience. It showed Friday morning commuters we were aware of violence against women in our own communities.

So often the women who plan demonstrations like this are criticized for not doing enough. In this case, the WAC demonstration was called "'a typical liberal response' to the problem of violence against women." It is easy to judge at the time of an action, and much harder to take the responsibility to plan such an action. WAC is an open forum for all women to propose action ideas. I personally welcome constructive criticism. I do not support the continued devaluing of women by other women, as I felt was present in the Collegian article.

Organizers were also criticized for inviting the Men's Resource Center to the action. The MRC was invited to this action to "run interference" between the women present and men who may have come to express anger at women, or who wish to support women, but do not know how. Rather than women educating these men, it seemed more appropriate to have men in that role. I firmly believe there should be actions for women only, and I also believe women are capable and plenty "good enough" to act and live without the presence of a man. This particular action drew men, and because men perpetrate the majority of violence against women, it seems fitting that men should take responsibility to stop it.

Educational action is certainly not enough. While we spend decades trying to undo sex role stereotyping and inherent violence, we must also demand that this violence stop. I have an investment in the future, but I also have an investment in making the survival of women possible today. The demonstration was only one example of the coalition's work. To find out more about who we are and what we do, come to a meeting.

Housing Services poster is sexist

As a member of the housing staff I have come in contact with a poster distributed by a faction of my department that both perplexes and infuriates me. The message on the poster instructs tenants of residence halls when and where not to wash their dishes. I have no problem with that. It's the graphics that are used that I find bothersome.

Depicted in the upper and right-hand corner is a man, seemingly white collar and upper class with a clothespin on his nose. His physical position on the page suggests that he is superior and in the right. His expression says that he can't be bothered by the nuisance of the other graphic, a woman, in the lower left-hand corner. She is shown to be the cause of the problem, with an apparently rancid-smelling frying pan with the fumes rising in one hand and a broom in the other. There is a spilled milk carton on the ground and a couple of rug rats with smudges on their faces to boot. Her expression is dumbfounded. The total graphical message seems to be that this working woman had best get her act together quickly so as not to bother the important man.

Is this the same university that preaches equality, the values of diversity and a non-sexist environment? You know, UMass, the school that insists that its employees attend diversity and sexual harassment workshops? So Housing, what's going on? Why is this poster in circulation? Doesn't it seem somehow hypocritical? Come clean; abolish this poster, don't print any more and tear up the master.

Third World Affairs page is for First

Regarding the Third World Affairs page [Collegian, March 30]:

Congratulations. Following the expulsion of the Third World staff in September, 1992, the Third World Affairs page has done a great job of avoiding the Third World. The last page was the most successful issue yet. Two large stories, both under the Third World Affairs banner, neither written by someone from the Third World nor dealing with anything in the Third World.

Having one American (a Puerto Rican) writing about a U.S. territory (Puerto Rico), and another American (a "Muslim-American," as she wrote) writing about Bosnia (in Europe) avoids the Third World beautifully.

This reminds one of the fact that this page has devoted space to Northern Ireland and even Russia, predicting that it would soon become part of the Third World.

This is pathetic! Why doesn't the Collegian just be honest and change the name to what the page has become: the First World Affairs page! Then you can keep the same First World editor articles and First World editor without all this tiresome hypocrisy.

■ deficit

1. The 1994 deficit would be about $250 billion. But if the plan works, the red ink would be shrunk by an average of $100 billion a year below what it would be otherwise, to $192 billion by the end of 1997.

The main ingredients: $273 billion in new taxes over the next five years — one of the biggest tax increases ever; defense reductions of $106 billion below what President Bush had recommended; and $117 billion in savings from non-defense programs, chiefly by cutting the size of government, reducing Medicare reimbursements for doctors and borrowing less money.

But even with the Democrats' idea of restraint, Republicans were quick to point out that spending on domestic programs would continue to rise. Mandatory programs, not even counting Social Security, would grow from about $471 billion this year to $557 billion in 1998. Other domestic spending would rise from about $250 billion this year to $295 billion in 1998.

Spending for the military would drop from $294 billion this year to about $253 billion in 1998; it still would exceed $1.3 trillion over the five years.

The Democrats' plan is aimed as much at reversing Reagan-Bush policies as reducing the deficit that built up during the 12 years the Republicans were in the White House.

Thus, the deep defense cuts and an income tax increase targeted on couples earning more than about $180,000 and singles earning above $140,000 — taxpayers who Democrats believe profited most from Republican economic policies.

have said hundreds of Americans with expertise in farming and business will be sent to Russia for up to two years to help modernize farms and factories and transform state industries into private enterprises.

The Russian president is taking a risk traveling to Canada at a time of political upheaval, but he wants to show his countrymen that Western democracies consider him the legitimate leader of Russia and the guarantor of political and economic reform.

While hard-liners are downright hostile to Yeltsin's pro-Western policies, moderates say the summit may further weaken Yeltsin, whose powers were reduced anew at a four-day emergency session of Congress that ended Monday.

The Soviet-era Congress has emerged as the main forum for criticism for Yeltsin's policies, which hard-line and moderate lawmakers say have caused undue hardship for the Russian people.

Moderate lawmakers urged U.S. leaders to support all democratic forces in Russia and not just Yeltsin.

"Tactless, primitive help will weaken Yeltsin's position," said moderate Yevgeny Ambartsumov. "Americans need to think about the consequences of their acts even though they are well-intentioned.

"The U.S. needs to think about how to help the democratic process and not just one man. I have great sympathy for Mr. Yeltsin, but tomorrow there may be someone else in his place," said Amartsumov, chairman of the Committee on International Affairs.

Reformers in Congress are anxious for the United States to do more than just make a symbolic gesture of help at the summit.

as "torture in Israel." The grave manifestations of human rights violations in the occupied territories are inhumane, where medical care is the medium used as a tool of punishment, Marton said.

She then told a story of a 44-year-old Palestinian woman, Fatima, who was being denied a liver transplant because the Israeli government did not want to finance the surgery. All Israelis are guaranteed health care by the civil government, unlike poor Palestinians who are left to die, she added.

"Israeli violence is overwhelming but Israelis should not be viewed as one," Marton warned.

Shyamala Ivatury, a graduate student, asked the two speakers to discuss the fact that monetary and military support for the "Zionist, settler-colonial state of Israel" is provided by the United States. Marton responded that it was up to concerned American citizens to pressure their government to stop aid to Israel since it was from the taxpayers' pockets.

"Soldiers killing and shooting is what I see every day," said Hala Salam, a worker of the Birziet University health department in the occupied territories. According to Ms. Salam thousands of people have been injured and killed, hundreds of them children.

"Peace is something, we need to work for," said Salam, "because I would like to see our people stop being killed in cold blood. We have the right to live as human beings."

At the movies: flaky Yesterday, pathetic Evil

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Forget The Crying Game. The big surprise of Born Yesterday is that bad actress extraodinare Melanie Griffith is quite effective as a blonde bimbo who wises up to her boorish boyfriend (John Goodman) and finds love and self-respect. In this flaky re-tread of the near-classic that won Judy Holliday an Oscar, Griffith and hubby Don Johnson (as the reporter/love interest) go through the motions of the 1940's romantic comedy without the charm, wit or panache that made the original so appealing.

The stale and outdated political satire (surprise! the town is full of liars and people who don't know anything) collides with the erratic one-liners in this passable comedy that figures if it walks and talks like a clever movie, it will be.

What keeps this from taking off is that neither Griffith nor Johnson are up to mimicking the lickety-split pacing or droll physical comedy of those forties screwball comedies. John Goodman is woefully miscast in a role that requires him to be an ass and still remain likable. He doesn't.

Griffith plays Billie Dawn, an ex-Las Vegas showgirl, who has become the beautiful ornament of a Chicago business tycoon (Goodman). The pair are in Washington D.C. to bribe some senators into not closing a major military base which will effect a new mall Goodman has built nearby. Billie's glowing stupidity is making it difficult to wine and dine the town, so Goodman hires a political writer (Johnson) to smarten her up.

Want to bet what happens next? Predictability is not much of a problem here, as part of the fun is waiting for Griffith to wise up to Goodman's horrendous treatment and tell him off. Unfortunately, there's a lot of stilted, recycled comedy in between.

The dated political commentary is also washout, though Griffith and company manage to keep the movie afloat — if only killing screen time before the inevitable conclusion. The romance between Griffith and Johnson is unbelievable and somewhat boring to watch, mainly because neither actor is very engaging. We're a far cry from Cary Grant and Rosalind Russell of His Girl Friday — heck, we're miles away from Griffith and Harrison Ford of Working Girl.

Goodman, saddled with an impossible role, is way too likable to be playing this brand of character — the script requires him to boogie down with Griffith in one scene and slap her around in another. Yeah, that's really funny. And the fact that Griffith only finds self-respect through the love of a man is stupid and archaic.

As for Don Johnson, he plays it so low-key it looks likes he's on Valium. His pretty-boy dimple acting is engaging to watch, but you keep waiting for the spark between him and Griffith. Their coupling never seems to ignite.

Born Yesterday has its moments — the comic high happens when Griffith leads a group of senators in an impromptu recitation of the Amendments to the Constitution to the tune of "The Twelve Days of Christmas." But there's nothing overly interesting or fun about the film. It's trying so hard to be the next Pretty Woman cum Working Girl that it — like Griffith's character — doesn't have a mind of its own.

Griffith, arguably one of our generation's worst actresses, was wise to return to the clueless, airhead bimbo-type role that earned her an Academy Award nomination for Working Girl. But that film at least was classy and amusing; Yesterday isn't much of either. Griffith can't act beyond this ditz persona — every other movie she's done is a testament to this — so she'd be wise to make Yesterday into a TV show. There, she and Johnson could grab a steady paycheck and Griffith could pretend she's being an actress. Hey — maybe even Tori Spelling could play her daughter. Ah — the comic possibilites!

Born Yesterday is a renter if ever there was one. At least for me, seeing Griffith on the big screen is more torture than entertainment. Yesterday isn't a total waste of time but it's far from being as funny or clever as it thinks it is. C

Hear No Evil — Perennially overrated actress Marlee Matlin (Children of A Lesser God) plays a deaf personal trainer who unwittingly becomes the target of a corrupt policeman (Martin Sheen) who believes she has a priceless coin that he stole.

Sound stupid? It is. With its slack, TV-movie pacing and plot, and hole-ridden script, Hear No Evil is a poorly acted woman-in-jeopardy movie that gets points for being amazingly thrill-less. The film does the killer-in-the-dark thing early on in the film, so we're left with Matlin screaming a lot and a dim-witted love story that is straight out of a bad soap opera.

The token love story has D.B. Sweeny (The Cutting Edge) as a man who wants to be her "hero" but then allows her to be a sitting duck in one unbelievable chase scene after another. This is as bad as thrillers come, folks — it's more sad than scary. D

Valley talent at Five Alive

By ADAM GOULSTON
Collegian Staff

The UMass Spring Concert is quite possibly the most eagerly-anticipated musical event in the Valley. There can't be more than a handful of UMass students who don't know of the concert's tradition of bringing bands of international stature onto the stage in front of the Campus Pond.

There are also few local bands who wouldn't give their left kneecaps to open the annual showcase. Our friends at UPC may not have given the contest to determine this opening act the best name, but a goofy title cannot detract from the fact Five Alive is the unofficial Son of Spring Concert — an exhibition of our finest young local products.

This Saturday at 8 p.m., the Bluewall will host a five-pack that should display an array of styles. In alphabetical order (so as not to show my preference), the bands are: Canine Bastards, Frances Gumm, Hector, Monghani and New Radiant Storm King.

Butterfield coffeehouse-goers and Collegian readers will recognize the Canine Bastards. The Bastards defy explanation as they emit a raucous musical amalgam "with influences from Elvis to Elton." Attempts at definition of their style are futile, so just go with their motto, "naked and loud, vacant and proud," followed by a lot of exclamation points.

Frances Gumm is a trio with roots in the Northampton area, but their reach has spanned the country, having played with the likes of Royal Trux, Ween and Pavement. Their product is an appealing and sonic one which explores a dynamic range. With a seven-inch EP to their credit, Frances Gumm's first full-length release will be out next year on Urge Records.

Hector established themselves on the Hampshire campus before gaining recognition on the local circuit. Originally called Calzone X, the name was changed to the current title in 1992 after a number of changes. What resulted was a sound which showed jazz and funk influences with a heavy backbeat. As they strive toward signing a major record contract, Hector continues to display its eclectic sounds in the Valley.

Borrowing their name from Tarzan's gorilla, Monghani makes music of vine-swinging energy. Also a frequent draw on the local scene, Monghani have been witnessed by scores of Hatchgoers. What the crowd hears is a fast-paced, funky, bluesy display of originals and covers. Monghani hopes to include Boston in its future touring plans. For now, Five Alive should do just fine.

New Radiant Storm King is the most accomplished band in the contest. Already having released a full album, My Little Bastard Son, Storm King has gained critical acclaim. Seen frequently at local venues and the Loud Music Festival, Storm King could have the added advantage of experience.

With the lineup for Spring Concert still under wraps, Five Alive's a chance to witness the unveiling of the first act. Grab a cup of Joe, pick a good spot on the floor and cheer on your favorite band. You just may see them again opening for. . .

Five Alive rocks the Bluewall this Saturday at 8 p.m. Tickets are $3 with a UMass ID, $5 for the general public and may be purchased at Tix Unlimited, For the Record and Main St. Records.

Arresting Cop Shoot Cop

Smash your head to some glorious noise at Pearl St.

By IAN CANADINE
Collegian Staff

Cop Shoot Cop is one band whose name accurately represents the thrust of its music — that being provocation — and it will be bringing this provocation straight to your face when it plays Pearl Street this Friday.

This four-piece band (Tod A., Natz, Phil Puelo, Cripple Jim) was originally formed in 1988 "in a roach-ridden New York City basement," one member recalls. After releasing two well-received EP's they unleashed their debut album, Consumer Revolt, onto the world in 1990. Their intense mix of noise/politics/anger was a welcome burst of inspiration on the moribund alternative scene of the time, which was apparently in terminal decline in the wake of the renaissance of the mid-to-late 1980's.

Despite being generally more appreciated in Europe than in its home country, the band forged ahead and released White Noise, its second album, in the fall of 1991, significantly increasing its popularity.

Now signed to Interscope (also home to Marky Mark and the Funky Bunch, bizarrely enough), the band has just released a new album, Ask Questions Later. They are currently embarking on a world tour, which will take them to Canada, Europe, Japan and Australia, as well as "the rock 'n' roll capital of the universe," Northampton.

Cop Shoot Cop's music combines a burning sense of anger at the state of the world with hardcore noise of the type used by forefathers such as Big Black. What sets them apart from the general mass of plodding indie rock mediocrity is their willingness to experiment with form and structure. They create their bloody noise with the unusual line-up of two bass guitars, percussion and samplers — no standard guitars in sight.

Their sound is also enhanced by bringing in other disparate elements, for example in the grandiose operate vocals of "Empires Collapse" on White Noise, or the violins and brass that crop up on Ask Questions Later.

It is because it has a different range of weaponry in its arsenal that Cop Shoot Cop attacks the listener in a wholly different way to standard rock, which currently seems to be crushed beneath the weight of its own formula.

The band's blistering sound is an extension of its political anger, black humor and deadly sarcasm — the small man's defenses against power. On Ask Questions Later, this kicks in straight away with the simultaneously sardonic/outraged first track, "Surprise, Surprise," when Tod growls: "Surprise, Surprise/ the government lies."

Their glare is also turned on the music scene itself, with "Seattle," a tape loop of droning noise from which the syllables of the title gradually build up in torturous repetition.

Ask Questions Later is actually a little disappointing compared to Cop Shoot Cop's previous output, feeling a bit flat due to overproduction, which has maybe worn away the band's rough edges.

However, tracks like "Surprise, Surprise" and "Furnace" still go straight for the jugular, and indicate that in the live context the band should be as forceful as ever. By all reports their sonic insurrection is a live experience not to be missed, so smash your head on some glorious noise this weekend.

Cop Shoot Cop play Pearl Street in Northampton tonight at 9 p.m. supported by Dieselmeat and Rodan. Call 584-7771 for ticket info. Show is 18+.

Raising Arizona: comedy with a visual kick

By MARTIN BROWN
Collegian Staff

Raising Arizona is really funny in a sort of freaky, hick, romantic sort of way. There is no other recent comedy comparable to it. The key to truly enjoying the film is to sit back, relax and let the Coen Brothers take you away, because if you are looking for reality and logic, this movie is not for you. But if you are the kind of person who just goes with it, this movie is quite humorous.

The thing that really makes people love or hate this movie is the way the characters speak in the film. It's a cross between hick and Shakespeare. Lines like, "I'd rather light a candle than curse the darkness" or "I do love her so" are just some of the strange but engaging diction spoken in this movie. I think in its own way it's kind of cool.

Anyway, the story is about a convict, H.I. (Nicholas Cage), who falls in love with a police officer named Edna (Holly Hunter). When he is released from jail, they get married and want to have kids. She can't get pregnant due to medical reasons and they can't adopt because of his criminal record, so they decide to steal a baby from a family who had quintuplets.

As I said above, the film was done by the Coen brothers in 1987. It was produced by Ethan, directed by Joel Coen and written by both of them. Their first movie, Blood Simple, was a grim story of revenge. They followed Raising Arizona with Miller's Crossing and Barton Fink, both bold and expressive films that received critical but not deserved audience acclaim.

Raising Arizona

Video Pick of the Week

The dizzying camera work in this movie will keep you on the edge of your seat. There must of been a half a dozen times in the film where I was scratching my head and wondering how they filmed a particular shot. A scene with a bunch of babies in the beginning of the film shown from the infants' perspective and an amazing fight scene at the end are fresh and exciting to watch.

Nicolas Cage and Holly Hunter both do exceptional work in this film. Arizona spring-boarded their careers to other movies like Wild at Heart and Broadcast News, respectively. Cage plays the easy going convict with a flare. You can't help but like the guy. Hunter plays the tough-as-nails mom with great conviction. It is a really great match-up.

John Goodman and William Forsythe head a fine supporting cast. Goodman and Forsythe play Gale and Evelle, two friends of H.I (Cage) while he was in jail. Trey Wilson also scores as Nathan Arizona, Sr., a bossy, hard-working furniture store owner who H.I. steals the baby from. He's especially entertaining in one scene where he has to deal with the local police and the FBI. It's just hilarious. Sam McMurray plays Glenn, a friend of Edna's (Hunter) who makes a wild suggestion that he probably shouldn't have.

One of the strangest things about the movie is the final supporting character, portrayed by Randall "Tex" Cobb. He plays the Lone Biker of the Apocalypse, the spirit of vengeance that haunts H.I. for taking the baby. Cobb looks like he hasn't taken a bath or shower in years — a reflection of his demented personality. This bizarre character pays off with big laughs at the end of the movie.

If you haven't seen Raising Arizona, you really should. Innovative both visually and with the dialogue, it is one of the funniest films I've seen. (Rated PG-13. 101 minutes)

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You finally get answers that had been delayed. Do more socializing for business purposes. Strengthening your ties with relatives will have many benefits.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Your ability to learn from experience gives you a big advantage over certain people. Return important phone calls. Be sure not to slip up when making bets.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Be on the lookout for new financial opportunities today. Keep personal spending to a minimum and tell your mate the whole story. A dynamic romantic relationship moves into high gear.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): A great day for getting tedious tasks out of the way. You may receive more help than you want, but be gracious — accept all offers of assistance. Romance operates under sunny skies.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Adopt a low-key approach at work today. The employment picture becomes more pleasant, thanks to a change of personnel. Raise a career decision on your financial requirements.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Romance begins to heat up. Becoming more self-reliant will open doors formerly closed to you. Feel free to experiment. Get your financial orders in better order.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Be careful not to take anyone for granted. Loved ones will respond favorably if you suggest a fair compromise. Make the best possible use of your time and talent where higher-ups are around.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): You may have a heavier workload than usual now. Face your responsibilities head-on. Contact an influential person who may be willing to offer financial backing for a creative project.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Gambling will not pay off. Keep your money in your wallet. Stay alert and obey all safety regulations when working with tools or machinery. Build savings.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Accompanying a lively friend to a party could have interesting results. The weekend is going to be a social. Information exchanged at a private meeting could have long-term possibilities.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Reread a letter about finances, a new interpretation is likely. Avoid making any changes on the home front without first consulting your mate.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Continue yesterday's efforts. This is no time to change course. Luckily, your ideas are right on target. Your relationship with a loved one could be improved. Patch up a quarrel.

'COLLEGIAN' TO PUBLISH DAILY; BUDGET APPROVED BY SENATE

by JACK DEAN
Managing Editor

UMass will have a daily newspaper next year.

In a marathon meeting which ended early Thursday morning, the Student Senate unanimously approved Collegian expansion plans by passing its $67,945 budget. This sum is the largest appropriation to any Recognized Student Organization.

The plan, according to Editor-in-Chief Chet Weinerman, will provide the campus with fresh news each day. "Not only will we be publishing daily", Weinerman told the Senators, "we are also planning for morning distribution."

Under this plan the Collegian will publish eight pages per day, Monday through Friday. An 8:30 campus delivery to the Dining Commons and Union is planned.

Included in the budget is provision for an official Collegian automobile. Weinerman pointed out to the Senators that in one year the car will more than pay for itself.

At a general staff meeting last night, Weinerman announced the Senate action and expressed his hope for cooperation from the staff to make the "new" Collegian one of the finest collegiate tailies.

Weinerman told the staff that the paper will publish each day during the week of May 8-12 in preparation for next Fall's daily schedule.

Also at the meeting Bob Gorman announced his resignation as News Editor to take the post of South College Reporter.

Collegian to Publish Daily

(Editor's note: The following editorial appeared in the Greenfield Recorder on May 3.)

The Greenfield Recorder, one of the oldest daily newspapers in the United States, is happy to note the impending birth of the daily Massachusetts COLLEGIAN at nearby Amherst.

This change to daily publication reflects the growth of the University of Massachusetts and its increasing importance in the lives of Bay State youth. It also is an indication of the value of a campus newspaper that has been growing in size, scope and frequency of issuance.

Some of The Recorder's readers would be regularly shaken and shocked by the COLLEGIAN It is sometimes impudent and often brash. No sacred cow is safe from its barbs and not even UMass President John Lederle is above criticism by the student editors.

That is how the COLLEGIAN should be. It is published by, of and for the student body at the University's Amherst branch. Since both its staff and readers are totally involved in the institution and student activities, anything that bears upon them is fair game. And when the UMass world is not right, youth chooses its most effective weapons to carry into the fray.

There are issues when our student friends at the Collegian office are almost unbearably stuffy and righteous. But their sense of humor always gets the upper hand again and the next edition is sure to have something that will delight—or enrage—the more elderly society of faculty and parents.

Publishing a newspaper daily is a demanding task. Now that the student body is larger than many a city, however, there almost certainly is enough talent available and eager to accept the challenge. Thus we await the new campus daily with keen anticipation and the realization that the more sedate public press must sharpen its own procedures to keep pace with our new neighbors.

Friday, May 5, 1967

This is a reprint of an article from 1967. The Collegian no longer receives any funding from the Student Senate or the University.

Zoo Disc spins into the spring season

By DAVID GLEESON
Collegian Correspondent

With the recent arrival of spring, the University of Massachusetts ultimate frisbee team, Zoo Disc, has begun its season.

While most people were shoveling away the snow from the storm of the century, 13 Zoo Disc players made a road trip through the storm to play in a St. Patrick's Day tournament in Greenville, N.C.

Zoo Disc, a spring-season collegiate team, had only one week to practice before facing its opponents, many of whom play year round. In North Carolina, Zoo Disc played the University of Virginia, North Carolina State University, the University of Vermont and East Carolina University.

Zoo Disc played close, competitive games, with exceptional performances by its younger players, who comprise 90 percent of the team.

The lack of practice hurt them and they were unable to win any of their games. With the few strong veterans left, and promising first-year players, they look forward to a successful season.

Regardless of the losses, the tournament was great practice for the team, and with the weather finally getting better Zoo Disc started up regular practice at UMass this week and promises to have more than a rebuilding year.

The season opener for Zoo Disc is this Saturday at Amherst College from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m., weather permitting, when UMass will meet its rival Hampshire College, and a host of other local teams.

Zoo Disc will host their own tournament at UMass on the weekend of April 24. The tournament will consist of between six and 10 New England college teams.

The time and location will be announced at a later date. This will be the one of many tournaments they will play in this season.

Zoo Disc hopes to win some tournaments this year, and make a strong showing in their section. In the mid-80's, UMass won the Nationals, which is the ultimate frisbee college championship.

With many young players, Zoo Disc hopes to return as a dominant force in the Nationals in the next few years.

The men's team is not the only "ultimate" team at UMass, the women's ultimate frisbee team, Zulu, is in the process of being reformed.

Although both teams are competitive, they are always open to new players. Any men interested in playing for the Zoo Disc team should contact Tim O'Leary.

Gorillas travel to Hofstra for two games

ANDREA MIGLIASSI / COLLEGIAN

The University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team travels to Hofstra University this weekend to face the Hofstra Flying Dutchmen and the 11th-ranked Duke Blue Devils.

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

The 10th-ranked University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team will head south this weekend to Hofstra University for a pair of games against Hofstra and No. 11 Duke.

A victory for the Gorillas would give coach Ted Garber his 100th career victory and distinguish the Garber father-son coaching tandem as only the second father-son duo to record 400 or more wins in college lacrosse history.

On Saturday, UMass (1-1) will face off against Hofstra (2-1) at 1:30 p.m. Last year, the two teams met in Amherst with Massachusetts winning convincingly 17-4, thanks to All American Mark Millon's five goals. This year, the Gorillas may not have as easy a time with the Flying Dutchmen as they will have to contain the likes of the team's two leading scorers, Andrew Carlson and Kevin Jacobs.

Carlson, a 5-foot-11-inch, 175 pound junior attacker, has had a great season so far, tallying eight goals and four assists for an average of four pts/game. Jacobs, a 5-foot-8-inch, 160 pound attacker, is averaging three pts/game on six goals and three assists. The Gorillas will also have to deal with senior midfielder Kevin Moran who has won 66 percent of his faceoffs.

Senior attacker Millon proves the UMass team has a potent scoring threat. Millon has eight goals and five assists and has scored at least one goal in 27 straight games. Teammate Greg Kline, a junior midfielder, has six assists and attacker Wes Depp has six goals thus far.

Sunday at 11 a.m., UMass plays the Blue Devils. The Gorillas have faced the Blue Devils only once: in 1960 at Durham, N.C., where UMass won 9-5. This year's game has USILA ranking implications: a win for the Gorillas could mean a jump in the polls. A win for the Blue Devils and Duke could vault over UMass in the polls.

Lax Notes: Mark Millon has scored two or more goals in 17 straight regular season games. His five goals in the Gorilla's 25-4 win against St. John's marked the eighth time he has scored five or more goals in one game . Both games can be heard on WMUA (91.1 FM) with Mike Fagerson and Brett Morris.

Sox having problems

Injuries and errors are hurting club

By ROB GLOSTER
Associated Press

PORT CHARLOTTE, Fla. — The Red Sox, who have had serious defensive problems on the left side of their infield this spring, found out Thursday that shortstop John Valentin has a broken finger on his throwing hand.

Valentin, who has made 11 errors in 21 games this spring, broke the ring finger on his right hand while fielding a ground ball in Wednesday's loss to the Chicago White Sox.

Red Sox officials said Valentin, who did not play in Thursday's exhibition game against the Texas Rangers, was on a day-to-day basis.

Red Sox infielders have made 31 errors in 29 games during spring training. Third baseman Scott Cooper made a pair Thursday, giving him nine during spring training.

Naehring on DL

The Red Sox placed infielder Tim Naehring on the disabled list Thursday. He is expected to be sidelined eight to 12 weeks while recovering from arthroscopic surgery on his right shoulder. The operation was performed last week at the University of Massachusetts Medical Center in Worcester.

Angry Hesketh

Starting pitcher Joe Hesketh fired his glove into the Red Sox dugout after allowing Texas three runs in the third inning, an inning in which an error by third baseman Scott Cooper led to all the runs.

"It was just a little steam that I had to let off. We're getting close to April 5 and I have my game face on," said Hesketh, who allowed five hits in the inning. "It was just a snap, I was mad at myself and other things."

Picked off

Two Red Sox were picked off first base by Texas left-hander Charlie Liebrandt on Thursday, continuing the baserunning problems Boston has had this spring.

Mo Vaughn was picked off after walking in the second inning and Mike Greenwell was picked off in the third inning.

The Red Sox did manage to bring their stolen base percentage up to .500 on Thursday by swiping two bases against the Rangers.

Baseball travels to D.C. to face struggling GW

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

After another week of practicing within the confines of Boyden Gym, the University of Massachusetts baseball team travels to Washington for a three-game series with Atlantic 10 rival George Washington this weekend.

The Minutemen (5-5, 1-1 A-10) are coming off a two-game split with St. Joseph's last weekend. However, the playing conditions of the two diamonds at Holy Cross and here at Lorden Field forced two more cancellations, bringing the season total to four.

George Washington (5-10, 0-3 A-10), which has opened up its regular season against some tough teams (Georgia, South Carolina, Coastal Carolina, James Madison and West Virginia), is on a skid, having lost ten games in a row.

The Colonials' last win, a 5-3 decision over Georgia, came on their spring trip to the South. Left-hander Ryan Clark (1-1) pitched four innings for the victory.

After the victory against the Bulldogs, GW's pitching staff has fallen apart. In their last outing, the Colonials yielded 17 hits en route to a 19-5 shellacking at the hands of A-10 foe West Virginia. The Colonial pitching staff has a team earned run average of 6.08, while the opponent has held GW to just over four runs per game.

The bullpen for the Colonials is led by left-handed closer Scott Linder, who is 1-1 with a 1.61 earned run average. Linder has also collected three saves and tallied 25 strikeouts in 22 and one-third innings of action.

GW's offense is led by shortstop Greg Patton who is hitting .333 with five home runs and 11 runs batted in. Outfielders Bryan Urda (.333, 1 HR, 6 RBI) and Allen Browning (.294, 3 HR, 8 RBI) are also potent threats at the plate for the Colonials.

Offense may not be as big of a problem as luck has been for GW thus far this season. The Colonials have lost six one-run games, and one other decided by two runs.

Notes from the Dugout: After ten games for the Minutemen, leftfielder Justin Howard leads the team in batting with a .450 average. In 40 at-bats, Howard has four doubles, a triple, and nine RBI.

Second baseman Mark Pileski leads UMass in RBIs with 10, hitting .429 in 35 AB.

On the mound, UMass redshirt freshman Jay Murphy has proven to be a stopper out of the bullpen, collecting two saves in four appearances. Murphy has only given up two earned runs in 10 innings pitched.

Braud and Christensen make it to gym regionals

By ANDREW BRYCE
Collegian Staff

It was about a week into the season, and the University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics coach Roy Johnson had set his team goals.

One of them is being fulfilled this weekend, as senior Steve Christensen and junior Jason Braud will compete in the Eastern Regionals on Saturday in Illinois.

Besides wanting his team to capture their fifth consecutive New England Open, which the Minutemen did, and to finish in the top half of the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Championships, which they also accomplished, Johnson said he hoped to have two or three guys in the Regionals.

Both Christensen and Braud have been the stand-out performers for the Minutemen all season, and both have become UMass record holders in their best events. Christensen qualified in the pommel horse, while Braud will be competing in the floor exercises and the vault.

Christensen and Braud have made it to the Regionals in previous years. Christensen made it during his sophomore year in the pommel horse. Braud qualified in his freshman year in the floor, and the vault his sophomore year. This big-meet experience can only help the two gymnasts.

Christensen, a co-captain from East Brunswick, N.J., is ranked second in the nation in the pommel horse, his highest national ranking of the season.

Having tied or broken his own UMass pommel horse record five times, Christensen, with a high score of 9.85, has received a sub-9.00 score only twice this season.

"I feel very confident going into this meet," said Christensen. "I'm ready. I'm basically doing the same thing I've done all season. I've added a little to my dismount, but it should be easy."

Braud, an Attleboro, Mass., native, will be competing in two events in Saturday's meet, though he has been concentrating on his floor routine. Braud is ranked seventh in the east in this event.

Braud shattered the UMass record in the floor exercise with a high score of 9.70, set against Syracuse University. He also became the first UMass gymnast to win an event at the E.C.A.C. championships during Johnson's 15-year run as head coach, as he won the the floor with a record-tying 9.70.

Johnson had another goal besides the others — to have one or two guys in the Nationals. The way Christensen and Braud perform in the Regionals will determine whether they will be heading to New Mexico for the Nationals. Both are confident that they can excel in Saturday's meet.

"I think if I stay the same, I'll do fine," said Christensen. "If I just hit my set, I'll be happy. Because I know if I hit this, I'll go on to the Nationals."

"This is more pressure than the Nationals," said Braud. "The Nationals are like 'Hey, I'm already here.' The Regionals are like 'If I screw up here, I'm done.'"

"This my first legitimate shot at Nationals, so there is a little bit of pressure. That's why I want to get it over with. I'm ready."

Christensen and Braud, according to Johnson, have more than achieved his expectations, but have not peaked yet. He feels they can go to the Nationals and compete with the best.

"Jason and Steve are each concentrating on one event instead of the four events they usually do," said Johnson. "I think this should help them to be even more consistent."

"This is the first time that we have had two gymnasts going to the Regionals that have routines that can go all the way to the NCAA finals. They can do it."

SPORTS NOTICE

The University of Massachusetts softball team and men's track team events for this weekend are postponed due to inclement weather and sloppy fields. Neither the softball team nor the men's track team will be able to compete because of the melting snow, rain and unkempt condition of the playing surface.

Rep. visits Amherst

Roosevelt meets with area students

By STEVEN L. COHEN
Collegian Staff

State Rep. Mark Roosevelt came to Amherst April 3 to meet with Democratic students from the Five College Area to find out what students want, to try to understand their needs and to give them an idea of what he stands for.

He spoke with over 30 students to discuss the potential future of Massachusetts and how it affects us.

Roosevelt, chairperson of the House Committee on Education and Arts, sponsor of a K-12 education reform bill, author of the state's gay rights law, a proposal requiring the use of recyclable packaging and the Childhood Hunger Relief Act and the great-grandson of President Theodore Roosevelt, is seeking the Democratic nomination for Governor in 1994.

Roosevelt stressed that the budget is an indicator of what is going on in the state. The state has spent too much in the past on the form of things like debt and pensions. Compared to nations like Germany and Japan, the state does not spend enough on the present, such as health care and welfare, or on the future, such as education, infrastructure, mass-transit, Roosevelt said.

"In order for the government to solve problems, instead of subsidizing them, we must reverse these facts," Roosevelt told the group of students.

Roosevelt credited Gov. Weld with putting the states' finances in order, using money that was voted on before his election, and noted that he may be hard to beat because of his 50 percent favorability rate and 0 percent negative rate.

Roosevelt attributed Weld's popularity to his record of not doing anything.

"He has killed more wild boars on hunting trips than he has brought businesses to Massachusetts," said Roosevelt.

Former UMass SGA President Jen Wood said she was satisfied with Roosevelt's plan to freeze tuition and fees and raise the state's aid, which has been drastically cut, to all state education institutions.

Increased state aid would decrease the eclipse of private colleges over public ones, while at the same time make it more accessible to students who are victims of the economy.

The money would not come from new taxes, but from, for example, the immensely expensive health costs of the terminally ill elderly.

Current SGA President Dave Nuñez said he will stay open to new candidates, but said he approved of Roosevelt's honesty. Roosevelt told Nuñez of his fights for civil rights. He noted that this must include a restructuring of our addictive welfare system that discourages recipients from getting jobs and becoming independent.

The education system is another situation said Roosevelt, where there is indirect discrimination against minorities, especially Blacks and Latinos, because of the current system of funding. He backs a state foundation budget for education to increase the funds of the school districts that need them the most.

Roosevelt said he would even challenge the state teacher's union if it would increase the quantity of quality education.

Roosevelt said he would also like to see less people entering the job market without having the opportunity for the non-college, post-high school training which makes countries like Japan so much more competitive.

On the issue of abortion, Rep. Roosevelt took a pro-choice stance. He said he favors lessening restrictions and lessening the need for the abortions in the first place.

Admitting he has voted to raise taxes three times, he said it should not be done again. The money taken in by the state must not be wasted as it has been, said Roosevelt.

Journalist discusses role as GLB historian

By FRANCIS ZERA
Collegian Staff

Tim McCarthy, a self-described "queer historian" and the first openly gay representative of the media to obtain a congressional credential press pass, spoke last Friday at the Campus Center as part of the Lesbian, Gay and Bisexual Alliance's Brown Bag Lunch Series.

The lecture, which McCarthy videotaped, coincided with the LGBA's annual Awareness Week. McCarthy's interactive style of speaking drew many questions and comments from the approximately 20 people in attendance.

Seeking to "document the lives of homosexuals" for future generations, McCarthy said "there is nothing extraordinary about us, except the desire to change" people's perceptions about homosexuals.

McCarthy has "travelled the planet" to record gay history. He said he aided in repealing Russia's anti-sodomy laws and in the release of men incarcerated for violating them.

McCarthy said he "believes in God", but he sees the Christian right-wing doctrine of 'condemning the sin, not the sinner' as "a cover for prejudice." He also said he acknowledges that "homophobia exists, but I don't bother with it."

Homosexuals should stand up to violence said McCarthy, because people who are not "easy targets" will be left alone. He also said he deplored "political violence" as a method of communicating ideologies.

L.A. police officer examines '92 riots, media coverage

By BRIAN C. O'NEILL
Collegian Staff

Lt. Paul Kim, a native Korean who was in charge of the Field Command during the riots said," Get ready for round two."

In a speech at Amherst College on Thursday night, Kim said he believed more riots are likely to come.

Kim blamed the riots on the bad conditions in parts of Los Angeles. He said many people that live in the area live below the poverty level and struggle to survive.

"Whatever caused the riots had little to do with Rodney King," he said. "What caused the riots was the living conditions."

He said the riots were destructive, but what happened afterwards was very positive. Some 40,000 Asian-Americans gathered in a park the next day, according to Kim.

"What I saw in the riots encouraged me, I saw lots of energy," Kim said.

Kim said the media only covered the violence, with little coverage of the aftermath. "In my opinion they didn't carry a very balanced point of view," he said.

"People need to be more constructive, they get stuck in this little Merry-Go-Round and just keep going around," he said.

Since the riots many people went out and legally bought guns, according to Kim. He said this is going to make the situation worse.

"Your going to see more citizens taking the law into their own hands," he said.

"The solution to this problem has to be more than just law enforcing," said Kim. "People have to stop looking at people as far as race, we have to look at them as far as how they contribute to the common good."

Recycling program a success

Housing Services aims to clean up campus waste

By FRANCIS ZERA
Collegian Staff

The Housing Services Recycling Program does far more than take out the trash, according to Program Coordinator Roger Guzowski.

Education and the dissemination of information are crucial for the success of the program, Guzowski said.

"Massachusetts produced 10 million tons of trash last year, which is 630 pounds per second," Guzowski said.

The Massachusetts Department of Environmental Protection's recycling statutes were the catalyst for the forming the program, as the new guidelines' effects trickled down through the layers of local government to the institutions and individuals producing trash, like UMass.

The Town of Amherst's Board of Health responded to guidelines by adopting regulations along with a fine system for noncompliance. According to Guzowski, the landfill has only about "five years left" before there is no more room for trash.

He said this resulted in the "strict" legislation, which states that refuse dumped at the landfill cannot contain more than 5 percent recyclable materials.

Karen Bouquillon, recycling coordinator for the Amherst Department of Public Works, said "in the past, there has not been rigorous enforcement of the regulations [as far as fining violators]. Instead of acting as 'garbage police,' we are acting as more of as an assistance program."

Bouquillon said beginning on April 1, new state regulations concerning recyclables go into effect. The regulations ban landfills from accepting glass and metal food containers, along with yard wastes. These are wastes such as brush clippings (under one inch in diameter), grass clippings and garden wastes.

The new regulations add to the current bans on leaves, car batteries, tires and "white goods." The term 'white goods' refers to large household appliances, such as refrigerators and stoves.

"I have a responsibility to the state to be watching this material," Bouquillon said. "I am working with the [trash] haulers and institutions to promote recycling at the consumer level" of banned materials.

Noncompliance with Amherst's regulations could result in fines of $50 per load in addition to the current "tipping" fees of $65 per ton. Enforcement of these fines would cost the University "lots of money," according to Guzowski.

The cost of the recycling program is less than the possible fines, and Guzowski said if the fines were enforced, the student body would pay for them eventually, providing a further incentive to recycle.

One of Bouquillon's major tasks is "keeping the University and other institutions well informed and do work to improve compliance and education."

"The Town and the University are moving ahead in ways we never have before" on the recycling issues, Bouquillon said.

According to Guzowski, the University recycled 15.5 percent, or 160 tons, of its waste last fiscal year, and "depending upon how you look at it, it was either very successful or not very successful at all."

The 15.5 percent figure does not meet the state's compliance standards, but it demonstrates a strong start for the program.

UNFORTUNATELY, THIS IS WHERE PEOPLE ARE PUTTING TOO MANY RETIREMENT DOLLARS.

Every year, a lot of people make a huge mistake on their taxes. They don't take advantage of tax deferral and wind up sending Uncle Sam money they could be saving for retirement.

Fortunately, that's a mistake you can easily avoid with TIAA-CREF SRAs. SRAs not only ease your current tax-bite, they offer a remarkably easy way to build retirement income—especially for the "extras" that your regular pension and Social Security benefits may not cover. Because your contributions are made in before-tax dollars, you pay less taxes now. And since all earnings on your SRA are tax-deferred as well, the money you don't send to Washington works even harder for you. Down the road, that can make a dramatic difference in your quality of life.

What else makes SRAs so special? A range of allocation choices—from the guaranteed security of TIAA to the diversified investment accounts of CREF's variable annuity—all backed by the nation's number one retirement system.

Why write off the chance for a more rewarding retirement? Call today and learn more about how TIAA-CREF SRAs can help you enjoy many happy returns.

Benefit now from tax deferral. Call our SRA hotline 1 800-842-2733, ext. 8016.

Editorial/Opinion

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers or cartoonists and do not necessarily reflect those of the Collegian unless otherwise noted.

Cartoon character comes out and meets real-life prejudice

The coming of spring always makes me feel a bit nostalgic. I remember the days of my childhood, getting off the big yellow school bus, running up the hill to my house, throwing down my books, then taking off across the street to play with the neighbor children, climbing in the thick oak tree in their back yard, collecting tiny purple forget-me-nots from the grass. Certain symbols of that time — a cartoon show in the early afternoon, a pop song from the early '80s — make me remember, and mean a lot to me.

I think that is why I've always held a place in my heart for "For Better or For Worse," Lynn Johnston's comic strip about a family a lot like mine, growing up and living real lives. I read it religiously as a child, and the characters, who Johnston always gave flaws and problems, were so real to me that I thought I knew them as human.

Now the characters who were running in the yard as I was doing the same have, along with me, grown up as well, to the point of falling in love. Last week, Lawrence, best friend of Everyboy Michael Patterson, told Mike that he had indeed fallen in love. . . with a man. Like many real men and women, he is gay. And, in the real world, he is met with prejudice.

Newspapers across the nation began to pull the comic, refusing to run it until after the current story line, slated to run for about four weeks, comes to an end. The Arkansas Democrat-Gazette said homosexuality is not a fit topic for a "family-oriented comic strip." I suppose the editors think gays don't have families capable of loving them. That paper has cancelled the strip altogether. Score a point for hatred.

The Union Leader, a right-wing muckraker whose relentless support was a key to homophobic Patrick J. Buchanan's frighteningly strong 37 percent showing in last year's New Hampshire republican primary, is the child of a man named William Loeb.

Loeb, now deceased, was quite possibly the worst journalist in the history of the United States. His editorials often used racist and anti-Semitic language to make his bigoted points. It was Loeb who drove Sen. Edmund Muskie out of the 1972 presidential race by terrifying Muskie's wife with comments on her personal life; it was Loeb who referred, in print, to former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, who is Jewish, as "Kissinger the Kike." The paper is now dominated by Loeb's widow, Nackey Loeb, an equally hateful person.

"There's a crusade going on right now, which is quite obvious — to have the homosexual life style viewed as acceptable and morally justifiable," said Nackey Loeb in the Boston Globe (which, by the way, is not joining in the hatefest and is continuing to print the comic). "And I am darned if the Union Leader is going to be used as a propaganda tool in the process."

I suppose I am a naive person. I was starting to believe that people were finally coming to the realization that a person is a person, and that condemnation of a person's sexuality is as wrong and as indefensible as the condemnation of a person's race, gender or religion. "You're not gay," Mike Patterson protests to Lawrence, whom he has grown up with, climbed in trees with. "You're just confused."

Lawrence disagrees. He simply replies, "It's everybody else who's confused."

She said 'yes,' but it was rape

"Have you ever participated in statutory rape (i.e., lived in Massachusetts)?"

What is the legal age of consent in Massachusetts? I've been told it's 17 by some. Others have said it's 18. Some say it's 16 if both partners are under 18, otherwise it's 18. When I was 17 and had sex with a 21-year-old man, I was told it was definitely 17. Almost two years later I'm hearing more and more that it's 18.

Frankly, I'm no longer worried about technicalities. I think it really isn't worth it after all this time. It wasn't legally date rape: I said yes. Because of that one word, I cannot charge him with rape, although I must bear the physical and emotional scars for the rest of my life.

I doubt laws will be passed to protect people in my position because I don't really have one. I said yes, end of story. Courts don't care that I said yes because he told me he loved me and that if I didn't do it more than once right away I'd get infected. The legal world doesn't care that I said yes only because I was afraid of being alone again and because he lectured me for half an hour after I said no on how it was the "right" thing to do.

I still blame myself for what happened. People go on and on about how you shouldn't blame the victim, but then I think, "What true victim ever says yes?"

Spanish column a missed chance

I would like to comment on Charles Venator's column in Spanish [Collegian, March 31]. Spanish is a beautiful language, but to those who don't speak it, the piece was just a jumble of letters. I have no doubt that many people who would have read this column and gotten something out of it didn't because they couldn't.

Printing a lone article in Spanish in an English-language newspaper only serves to build more walls; a subtle message is conveyed to the reader that if they don't speak Spanish they are not to be bothered with.

Another point is that if someone wanted to write a column in Japanese or Russian, they could not be accommodated because of the different characters.

The Collegian offers an opportunity to educate the ignorant. In order to be a student at UMass, one must speak English. Since we all know that we all understand English, maybe we should try to educate the general student population in that language.

If Mr. Venator wished to speak only to speakers or Spanish, he might consider starting a Spanish-language newspaper.

UM, Germany share problems

Dear Dr. Helmut Kohl:

We are American students in the German department at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, Massachusetts, USA. We are writing to you, because we needs your help in bringing about a more humane world.

We understand the current problems and the difficulties you are faced with in handling cultural diversity. We too are faced with these problems in our big cities and on our university campuses. Here, in the United States, the difficulties created by rightist extremists (skinheads, etc.) are not quite as prominent. This problem has not surfaced with quite the same intensity and harshness as in Germany. But there are conflicts which, much like Germany, are settled violently.

Here, at the University of Massachusetts campus, several violent acts against foreigners were committed: this past fall, a young man from Haiti who held the position of "resident assistant" in a dormitory was attacked by a young White man. Because of the administration's inaction in this matter, the students formed a "Rainbow Patrol" coalition. This Rainbow Patrol, consisting of students of different cultural and ethnic backgrounds, has been patrolling all dormitories on campus and if they come across any racketeering and brawls, they immediately report them to the police. All students and all citizens of Amherst can thereby see that they don't have to rely on the police or the administration. They can all help in actively preventing such acts of violence.

This German 425 class therefore would like to express its solidarity with those German citizens who actively fight for the protection of all foreigners in Germany.

We believe, however, that such conflicts mirror social problems. It is the task of our governments to actively participate in redressing such social problems. We believe the current problems in Germany (the resurfacing of fascism with all its abhorrent excesses) to be of social nature as well. We therefore ask you to help these apparently misguided youths and assign them a place in German society. In this difficult situation, you could show leadership not only for all Germans at home and abroad, but also for politicians of other nations such as the United States, South Africa or Britain, where similar problems abound!

We want to support you in your efforts, so that the next generation will not have to fight this battle.

Wendy Owanisian-Wagner, M.A. Instructor

This letter was signed by 10 students in German 425, and was printed in a German newspaper.

The Bible honors women

The biggest biblical misconception that I have come across thus far is the belief that the Bible treats women as second class citizens. Not true. "In the beginning," is a good place to start.

The Bible tells us why God created Eve: "The Lord God said, 'It is not good for the man to be alone. I will make a helper suitable for him.'" Psalm 46:1 states, "God is our refuge and strength, an ever-present help in trouble." The Hebrew word used for the word "help" in both verses is the same — equal. Now, if God wanted women to be inferior, why would the type of help that woman is to man be placed on the same level as the type of help that God is to mankind?

Diana D'AVANZO

However, because most people are not aware of this, the argument usually starts off with, "The Bible says that women are inferior and wicked. After all, Eve ate the apple then tricked Adam into eating it too. . . " Why not deal with the facts before making such a ridiculous statement? Allow me.

What really happened? Scripture tells us that Eve was deceived. "'You will not surely die,' the serpent said to the woman. 'For God knows that when you eat of it your eyes will be opened, and you will be like God. . .[Gen 3:4]." Eve ". . . took some and ate it. She also gave some to her husband, who was with her, and he ate it [Gen 3:6]."

Before going further, notice that Adam is with Eve. This means one of two things: Adam heard everything and so was equally as deceived, or Adam had cotton in his ears and willingly ate the fruit that God just told him not to eat.

The exchange could have gone something like this. Eve: "Dear, eat this fruit." Adam: "The one God told us not to eat?" Eve: "Yes." Adam: "Duh, okay." (Boy, this really sounds like women are inferior, doesn't it?) There is no evidence of Adam using any cotton. Obviously, Adam was equally as guilty.

Then why does Adam blame Eve? "The woman you put here with me — she gave me some fruit from the tree, and I ate it [Gen 3:12]." We have here a simple case of passing the buck. Remember blaming that broken glass on your younger brother? What makes you think Adam wouldn't try to get out of having to answer to God almighty?

Adam, however, did not get out of it. God tells Adam, Eve and the serpent what will happen as a result of their disobedience. People seem to be familiar with what is said to Eve: "I will greatly increase your pains in childbearing; with pain you will give birth to children. Your desire will be for your husband and he will rule over you."

Notice that, just like what is said to Adam, this is a result of their disobedience. In other words, because Adam and Eve sinned in the eyes of God, they must now face the consequence of their sin. Unfortunately, not only did they screw it up for themselves, but they did so for the rest of the human race. History is the best illustration of this. Women have been oppressed by men and mankind has been taken advantage of. This proves your point, right? Wrong!

Remember that this is the result of man's sin. God knew what would happen if Adam and Eve sinned. God did not want this to happen — that is why he warned them not to do it. Man disobeyed and, as a result, paid.

Some may ask, "Why didn't God just cancel out that consequence? Make it not happen?" Simple: God is holy, perfect and just. Unfortunately, to not have mankind pay, would not be just.

The conclusion? The Bible does not paint women as inferior, second class human beings. In fact, the Bible does the opposite. Throughout scripture women are shown to be strong and men are commanded to honor women.

Stolen flag more than just cloth

A week ago Saturday, the brothers of Pi Kappa Alpha had something very dear to them stolen and would like it returned.

In 1989, when Shawn Rooker was just 19 years old, he and the other U.S. Army Rangers parachuted into Panama. Jumping out of that plane into unfriendly territory, at the shallow height of only 500 feet, along with Shawn was his M16, one 9-millimeter pistol, a rucksack, two changes of clothes and his American flag.

In 1990, just two years after serving in Panama, Shawn and the other Rangers in the First Battalion were deployed to Saudi Arabia. Once again, Shawn's American flag accompanied him for every long and toilsome minute.

Last fall, U.S. Army Sergeant Shawn Rooker, two-time veteran at 23, became a brother of the Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity. As expected, his American flag was by his side. However, instead of being folded and kept in the side pocket of a rucksack, Shawn graciously donated it to his fraternity house so that it could be proudly flown for all to see.

Unfortunately, Saturday night that flag, along with the stains from Panama, the sand from Saudi Arabia and all of Shawn's pride and memories, was stolen from 418 North Pleasant Street. Shawn and his fraternity brothers are now asking that it please be returned. No questions will be asked. Please mail it to 428 No. Pleasant Street, Amherst, or drop it by the house.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Just by beginning, you start winning! A work or domestic adjustment goes more smoothly than expected. Your loving intentions send the romantic temperature soaring tonight.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Encouraging news is featured today. Share the glad tidings with your loved ones. Keep your financial goals firmly in mind. Be prepared for relatives who arrive earlier than expected..

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Your personal views regarding the management of cash and other assets are sound. Examine any problems in depth to avoid arriving at quick but faulty decisions.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Refuse to be thrown off track by criticism if you seem to be making headway. Keep adding to your assets. It may be a while longer before an overdue letter shows up.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Despite someone's assurances, a new investment could turn up in the loss column. Further research will yield hidden dangers. Learn from your mistakes and apply those lessons to the future.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Profitable dealings are possible if you bargain today. Others will follow your lead when you show them how to make something work.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): A long-awaited agreement may be sealed today; push hard for results if you want to close the deal. Be tactful tonight if you sense tension in the air. Become a better listener.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A business or career endeavor may falter due to insufficient research. Learn to score big! A little finesse will help you get an important postponement.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): You can jump-start a stalled financial project by consulting experts or VIPs. Put the past to rest. An electrical problem at work, home, or in the auto should not be neglected.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): End an arrangement that is cluttering up your life. Your conservative practicality will impress VIPs. Recycling old projects is an excellent way to improve the bottom line.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): You may have to weather a sudden storm on the work front; a cool head is your umbrella of protection. Gifts given or funds shared could backfire; save them for another day.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Be alert! You could be under fire personally or professionally. Move cautiously to win new status points. A conservative approach is your strong suit today.

When asked how he felt about false media portrayals of 'queers', McCarthy responded that it is "appropriate to protest media images, but not to censor them." He went on to state that gays should "produce our own images."

McCarthy is "pleased" with the fact that the mainstream media does attempt to portray gays, and said this "promotes the education of the media and thus the public" concerning gay issues. He predicts lesbian/gay sitcoms and talk shows being broadcast in the near future.

"Queers", whom McCarthy defined as all people of non-traditional sexual preferences, "must take advantage of opportunities" concerning the usage of cable television public access channels to educate the public.

"I'd rather look like a fool than not to get our message out."

"We are a people based not upon sex but upon sensuality - personal relations without sexuality" said McCarthy. He also said society has taught that the only distinction between "straight" and "queer" is sexual preference.

"Emotions are what separate queer from straight, not the actions."

Want to help us serve 1,000,000 meals to the hungry?

Sign here.

Now every time you use the Card to buy anything at all, you're helping provide a meal for the hungry.

A new CD. An LSAT prep course. A pair of running shoes.

It makes no difference what you buy. Because as a Student Cardmember, each time you charge a purchase with the American Express Card from March 15 to April 30, 1993, you help pay for one meal for someone who's hungry.

The more purchases you make, no matter how big or small, the more meals you help provide. It's that simple.

Our goal? To help buy 1,000,000 meals* for America's hungry men, women and children.

To make it work, we've brought together a powerful team — you, our Student Cardmembers, and Share Our Strength. SOS is a nationwide non-profit organization fighting to end hunger. And they're doing it in some very resourceful ways.

For example, most restaurants have extra food at the end of the night, but they don't always know what to do with it. SOS does. They see to it that the food is delivered to those who need it. In fact, they've mobilized more than 5,000 restaurants to join the fight against hunger, here in the U.S. and around the world.

So next time you reach in your wallet to pay for a purchase, put it on the American Express Card. And help make a difference to someone who's hungry.

Three new films tell the same old story

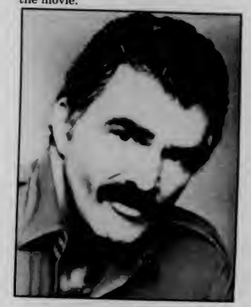
Hollywood continues to flood market with formula flicks

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Does anyone remember the last time I reviewed a good movie? All of these C's and D's are starting to look like my transcript. Yes, I know it's the time of year after the big Christmas season and before the big summer rush, but do the studios have to release every turkey they've got . . at one time?

Let's get this over with. This week, three new films share a dubious similarity: they're all high-concept, low-rent movies that give new meaning to the word cliche. Not that formula can't be fun, but when the formulas are this tired and this forced, one can't help but wish for the days when going to the movies didn't feel like watching bad television.

First up is a silly flick called The Crush. If you've seen the ads for this Amy Fisher-esque tale of a 14-year-old girl and her 28-year-old object of obsession, you've seen the movie.



AP PHOTO
Burt Reynolds stars in "Cop and a Half."

When hunky writer Nick (Cary Elwes) moves into the guest apartment of Darien's (Alicia Silverstone) parent's home, she goes bonkers and starts stalking him. First she teases him — sunbathing outside his window in skimpy bikinis and when he refuses (after, of course, sneaking a look), Darien's crush culminates in a false rape charge and a slasher movie finale.

Throughout this pulpy, trashy film, writer/director Alan Shapiro lays on the visual and plot rip-offs (oh, excuse me, homages) to at least a dozen other movies. Look! There's the attic finale from Hand that Rocks the Cradle!, the closet voyeur from Blue Velvet!, the bee attack from The Temp! and the most shameless — yet another variation on the shower scene from Psycho (set this time in a darkroom)!

The character of Darien herself is a direct descendent of Kubrick's Lolita, Alex from Fatal Attraction, Peyton from Hand that Rocks... and Sharon Stone from Basic Instinct. The theme here is that every intelligent, attractive woman must be a psycho bitch from hell.

And despite the fact that Nick is clearly portrayed as a victim, the film allows him (and the audience as well) to ogle Darien's body and then fear her. This not-too-subtle knock at female sexuality — especially the myth that rape victims 'faked it' is just plain reprehensible. A little bit of this lame male paranoia goes far. Time for a new trend, Hollywood.

By the time The Crush has set up its ridiculous conclusion — Darien with a fireplace poker chasing Nick through the attic while her friend Cheyenne is bound and gagged to the miniature carousel (shades of Hitchcock's equally gonzo finish of Strangers on a Train) — you'll wish D-FENS from Falling Down just came over and blew everyone up. They deserve it, anyway.

There aren't any explosions in Jack the Bear, but considering the lengths this film goes to be heart-tugging, I wouldn't be surprised if director Marshall Herskovitz offed the entire cast to elicit even more crocodile tears from the audience.

The relentlessly downbeat and crassly sentimental Bear at least starts off promising. Danny DeVito plays a late-night schlock horror movie host who is trying to raise two young boys, the 12-year-old Jack (Robert Steinmiller Jr.) and three-year-old Dylan (Miko Hughes) after the death of their mother.

Bear is labeled as one of those movies where "you'll laugh, you'll cry," but be prepared to hurl as well. Unlike other (better) sentimental family dramas, like Terms of Endearment or Men Don't Leave, Bear tries so hard to be emotionally devastating and then ties it up so neatly, it's like having a nervous breakdown and therapy in one sitting.

It's not a question of being a cynical, cold-hearted film snob because of the almost sadistic lengths Bear goes to for emotion. Whether it's almost gratuitous scenes of the young boys crying, or a nasty subplot about a neo-Nazi next-door neighbor (Gary Sinise) who subsequently kidnaps the three-year-old, Bear is trying to be a hard-egded but ultimately fuzzy, let's-hug film. However, the hysterical writing and exploitive direction does not deliver.

Despite being exceedingly well-acted (DeVito almost makes me forget Hoffa and Steinmiller, Jr. has a few wonderful scenes with my favorite child actress, A Far Off Place's Reese Witherspoon), Bear doesn't have a lick of faith in any of its characters. Too often the film goes for hokey, TV-movie of the week dialogue like, "Who's the parent and who's the child?" "I don't know" instead of reaching inside and oh my gosh actually show some depth. Audiences deserve more than cinematic misery.

While we're on the subject, I also saw Cop and a 1/2. Henry Winkler — the Fonz himself — directed this sloppy, by-the-numbers "comedy" that, for lack of a better word, sucks.

Burt Reynolds plays a curmudgeonly cop who is paired with an eight-year-old kid (Norman D. Golden II), who witnessed a crime and has effectively blackmailed the police into letting him be a cop for a day. Promising yes — good, no.

AP PHOTO
Danny Devito stars in "Jack the Bear."

If it isn't the crappy Home Alone-type cartoon violence or the shoddy production values that turn you off, try watching Reynolds say he "hates kids" at the beginning and find out that he really — oh forget it. I had to see it, you don't. The Crush: D- Jack the Bear: C Cop and a 1/2: F

Movie Notes — When I placed Quentin Tarantino's explosively absorbing (and funny) Reservoir Dogs on my top 10 list last December, hardly anyone had heard of it. But now it's been playing at Pleasant Street Theater for a few weeks so do try to catch this superbly acted and corrosively entertaining film with lots of violence. It's also coming out on video next week, along with Woody Allen's woefully underrated head-trip Husbands and Wives. Compare Judy Davis' Oscar-nominated performance with that of winner Marisa Tomei's in My Cousin Vinny and tell me what's wrong with this picture.

Marshall wins all-around at Regionals

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

Heading into the NCAA Regionals, senior Tammy Marshall of the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team said she had to stay solid in order to have a shot at the all-around championship.

Marshall accomplished what she set out to do on Saturday as she captured the all-around title with a solid score of 38.225. She edged out her closest competitor, April Polito of Penn State, by .025 of a point.

The Minutewomen, who went in seeded fifth, finished one slot better, edging out Atlantic 10 rival Rhode Island, 186.5750-186.3500. The WRams were seeded fourth, but swapped positions with UMass, falling to the Minutewomen for the third time in as many meets this season.

Penn State won the Northeast Regionals with a team score of 190.5250, followed by host Ohio State (188.1250) and New Hampshire (187.8250). Kent State (184.4000) and Pittsburgh (183.5000) rounded out the seven team field in sixth and seventh respectively.

Marshall led UMass on the vault (9.55) and beam (9.80), and was tied for the team high (9.55) on bars with junior Margaret Furtado. Furtado, one of three all-around threats for the Minutewomen, came into the meet nursing a sprained ankle that had hampered her for several weeks.

Freshman Shaheda Keels finished in thirteenth place in the all-around with a score of 37.35, and Furtado ended up sixteenth with a score of 36.85.

The highest team event for UMass was floor, topped by Keels' performance that yielded a 9.775. Freshmen Ruth Reeves (9.250) and Leann Zavotka (9.425), Furtado (9.25), senior Lisa-Beth Cronen (8.825), and Marshall (9.325) filled out the rest of the floor squad.

On beam, Zavotka scored her career best, a 9.50 to help lead the team to a 46.775 total. Reeves (8.75), Keels (8.775), Furtado (9.05), senior Abby May (9.650), and Marshall made up the rest of the beam team for the Minutewomen.

UMass will compete in the National Invitational Women's Championships, to be held at S.E. Missouri State University, on April 12.

Tar Heels head to finals, defeat Kansas in semis

By STEVE WILSTEIN
Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS — Eric Montross, North Carolina's mountainous Mr. Inside, and Donald Williams, the slick shooting Mr. Outside, took turns pummeling Kansas.

Montross dunked, Williams popped a 3-pointer, Montross flicked in a soft, short hook, Williams tossed up another 3-pointer.

They were like a quick jab and a roundhouse right coming at Kansas all Saturday night, and after a 78-68 victory in the Final Four the Tar Heels are back in the chasmpionship game in the same Superdome where they last won the NCAA title in 1982.

Clawed and bleeding, wrapped in tape on his fingers and shin, Montross flexed his muscles and shook off pesky Kansas from start to finish.

The 7-footer was unstoppable under the backboards, scoring 23 points and clogging the middle on defense, while Williams surpassed him from the outside with 25 after hitting 3-pointers in seven attempts.

"We needed Donald Williams' outside shooting and he really came through," North Carolina coach Dean Smith said. "And our big people did a great job on their big people."

North Carolina led virtually from the start, yet every time the Tar Heels seemed on the brink of breaking open the game, Kansas shot its way back behind Adonis Jordan and Rex Walters' 19 points apiece. Kansas' starting front line accounted for a total of only 15 points.

"Their whole team's a lot stronger," Walters said. "This is the second most phyusical game we've played in all year. I haven't seen that much strength in a team since we played Michigan. Physically, they put bodies on you. Not their big guys only, but their guards, too.

"Whenever we'd make a run, whenever me or Adonis would make a three, they'd come right back and get it inside. They just physically wore us down."

Kansas may have been worn down and beaten up, but the Jayhawks never quit in a game that was thrilling throughout.

Only in the final minute, when North Carolina pulled away 75-65 and Kansas was forced to foul, did the victory seem certain for the Tar Heels.

This was a brilliant matchup of styles, dictated more by the size and talents of the players than the similarities between Smith and his former assistant, Roy Williams of Kansas.

Montross inside and Williams outside scoresd 29 of North Carolina's 38 points in the second half, and there was nothing Kansas could do to contain them.

"Our offense is basically go inside and hopefully open up the outside stuff," said forward George Lynch, who had 14 points and 10 rebounds. "Eric did a great job of taking it to them, so there was no reason to go to any other option."

North Carolina (33-4) moved within a victory of repeating its run to the championship here. In Smith's 32 years guiding the Tar Heels, they've reached the Final Four nine times and the championship game five times.

The victory evened Smith's friendly rivalry with Williams, whose Jayhawks beat the Tar Heels in the NCAA semifinals in 1991 before falling to Duke in the championship game.

"Two years ago, we made the plays down the stretch and they didn't," Williams said. "This time, it was just reversed. But besides the coaches and the players on that staff, there wouldn't be anybody rooting harder for North Carolina Monday night than I will be."

Kansas (29-7) last won the national title in 1988, but then went on three years' infractions before Williams took over the following season. The Jayhawks' only other NCAA championship in nine Final Four appearances came in 1952.

The contrast this time couldn't have been clearer on offense: North Carolina's size and inside strength against Kansas' outside shooting. The Tar Heels outrebounded the Jayhawks 35-24.

From the start, when Montross opened with a short jumper and Jordan responded with a 3-pointer, the pattern was set.

Each team showed of its similar trapping defenses, North Carolina more often pressing from backcourt to basket, but on offense the teams went separate ways.

Montross, who has quick, strong moves and an eye for assists, helped North Carolina to a 12-6 lead. But outside shooting by Jordan and Walters, who had 13 points in the first half with three 3-pointers in five attempts, closed the gap to 21-20.

The Tar Heels then went on a 9-0 run for a 30-20 lead, keyed again by Montross and Lynch, who had four of his 10 first-half points during that span.

Both teams took aim from outside the 3-point line for the rest of the half, Williams hitting for North Carolina, Walters for Kansas, and the Jayhawks cut their deficit down to 40-36 with a long jumper at the buzzer by Darrin Hancock.

"The first 14, 15 minutes of the game, I didn't think our defensive intensity was as good as it needed to be," Williams said. "But when we got it back to four at half-time. I felt real good because we hadn't played our best game by any means and we were only down by four."

But the pattern continued in the second half, Montross tapping in an offensive rebound in the opening seconds, Walters hitting his fourth 3-pointer. Each time Montross seemed to knock everyone away and and put the Tar Heels in control — he scored eight of North Carolina's first 10 points in the second half - the resilient Jayhawks came back. Jordan hit a 3-pointer, Scott a couple of rare Kansas layups, and suddenly Kansas was down only 48-46.

Montross did it again, hitting two a short hook and a layup to help North Carolina go ahead 54-46, but once more a 3-pointer by Jordan started the Jayhawks back. The Jayhawks chased relentlessly, yet each time they came close Montross and Williams kept North Carolina out front.

Michigan advances in OT, tops Kentucky by three

By JIM O'CONNELL
Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS — Michigan finally played a game no one could criticize.

The Wolverines came up with the effort everyone had been waiting for since the NCAA tournament began, ending Kentucky's impressive march through March Madness to reach the championship game for the second straight year.

Their first full 40-minute effort in five tournament games was actually 45 minutes. The 81-78 overtime victory over the Wildcats on Saturday night was as exciting as expected, but it was played at a much slower pace. Instead of a wild up-and-down transition game, it was one of great defense, with no play better than Chris Webber's with four seconds left.

"What we've been trying to say all year is that we're winners and winners find a way to win," guard Jalen Rose said. "They have to be probably the best team we played all year, but we found a way to win."

Entering the Final Four, the Wolverines had been accused of sleepwalking through a not-so-tough regional and turning it on only when the game was on the line.

They turned it on against Kentucky at the opening tap and kept it up the full game, playing tenacious man-to-man defense and using their size advantage to dominate the boards.

Webber, who had 27 points and 13 rebounds, gave the Wolverines (31-4) the lead for good on a layup after a spin move with 41 seconds left. Rose added two free throws for Michigan 20 seconds later.

Rodney Dent tried to inbound the ball for Kentucky's last chance with four seconds left. But Webber jumped and deflected the ball in midair. After a scramble, Kentucky's Tony Delk missed a desperation heave.

A 2-point basket wouldn't have helped Kentucky so Webber had a distinct advantage.

"I just realized there weren't going to be any inside passes to the basket so I didn't have to protect the basket," he said. "I like guarding a guy who has to take the ball out because I can read his eyes pretty well."

He read Dent's well enough so that Michigan will meet North Carolina for the title on Monday night. The Tar Heels, who are trying to give coach Dean Smith his second championship in nine Final Fours, advanced Saturday with 78-68 victory over Kansas.

The title game will be a rematch of the semifinals of the Rainbow Classic in December. Michigan beat North Carolina 79-78 on an offensive rebound at the buzzer.

Kentucky (30-4) was dealt a harsh blow when Jamal Mashburn, who had 26 points, fouled out with 3:26 left in overtime.

"We had an unbelievable lift and they definitely had a letdown," Michigan's Ray Jackson said of Mashburn's fifth foul. "When your captain goes out it's going to hurt and we took advantage of it."

The Wolverines trailed by as many as four points in the overtime, 76-72, but then Kentucky lost Mashburn and the Wildcats looked disoriented on offense.

"The ref's got to call something," Mashburn said. "He called a foul."

Kentucky's final points of the game were two free throws by Delk with 1:12 left that gave the Wildcats a 78-75 lead. Jackson scored on a drive 18 seconds later for Michigan, and then Webber and Rose closed the game with their four points and great defense.

Rose had 18 points and Juwan Howard added 17 for Michigan. Travis Ford had 12 points for Kentucky , all after halftime.

The Fab Five, who lost to Duke in the title game last season as freshmen, have a chance to win it again one year later.

"What people don't speak about this team is defense," Howard said. "That's what really keyed our victory tonight."

One of our labels is that we're not disciplined," Webber said. "When you go against Kentucky you have to be disciplined. Coach did a good job saying, `It's not an ego thing but we have to play our game.' We ran more set plays than ever."

It is the second straight year Kentucky's season has ended with an overtime loss. Last season it was Christian Laettner's miracle shot that put Duke in the Final Four. The Wildcats made it this year to the national semifinals for the first time since 1978, but Michigan ended it one game earlier than Kentucky would have liked.

"It was a great game, but not so great for us," Kentucky coach Rick Pitino said. "We had to fight a lot of adversity down the end. Michigan made the plays. We're very disappointed. We felt we had a victory and we let it get away. They did excellent job on the perimeter defense and we talked about it all week. Their defense was excellent in the second half.

"It's the same emotion when you end the season with a loss. Last year we could have made the Final Four, this year we could have won a national championship."

Michigan advanced to the Final Four with wins that weren't nearly as impressive as Kentucky's four by an average margin of 31 points.

"Kentucky was terrific tonight," Michigan coach Steve Fisher said. "We had a little more down the stretch. We played awfully well, made the important plays when we needed to make them. Good players do that."

Webber, a 54 percent free throw shooter during the season, was 7 of 9 from the line and Michigan, 65 percent shooting team, finished 23 for 30, none bigger than Rose's two for the final margin.

Jobs bill still stuck in Senate stalemate

White House considering compromise

By ALAN FRAM
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The White House signaled on Monday that it was prepared to compromise on its jobs bill as Senate Democrats and Republicans hunted for a way to end their standoff over the 16.3 billion package.

Behind the scenes, the two sides searched for a compromise over the jobs bill, which is a central ingredient of Clinton's prescription for economic recovery. Republicans want to trim the measure and pay it by cutting other programs.

Referring to Republicans, Clinton told local reporters that, "They may hit us a little on this."

On the Senate floor, Democrats failed for the third time to find enough votes to halt a GOP filibuster that has stalled the bill for over a week.

This time, the vote to halt the delays was 49-29 — 11 votes short of the 60 needed to clear the way for a vote on final passage.

Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell, D-Maine, conceded that the message was becoming clear, even before he held a fruitless meeting with his GOP counterpart, Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan.

"If we can't get 60 votes, we can't pass this bill its present form so we'll have to do the best we can to get as close to that as possible," he said.

On his way to an opening day baseball game in Baltimore. Clinton jabbed at Republicans for the stalemate.

"In a time when no new jobs are being created. . . it means that for political purposes, they are willing to deny jobs to places like Baltimore, Dallas, Houston, Pittsburgh and Philadelphia and Cleveland and Seattle," he told reporters.

It's just real sad," he said.

White House spokesman George Stephanopoulos suggested that a compromise was possible. He said the White House would follow Mitchell's lead.

"The Senate's in discussion right now and we're prepared to listen if Sen. Mitchell makes a recommendation, but we're still pushing for the president's package," Stephanopoulos said.

AIDS quilt equated with death

Founder says memorial represents society's failure

By KRISTEN LANS
Collegian Staff

AIDS memorial quilt founder, Cleave Jones, said Thursday the quilt is a symbol of society's failure to stop the disease because of its stupidity and hatred.

The entire quilt, made up of 23,000 individual quilts, was last displayed in Washington D.C. in October. Pieces of the 30-acre memorial are currently spread over the United States, according to Jones.

He said the idea for the quilt began during a conversation he had in 1985 about a local newspaper story on the rising AIDS death toll.

"If this was a field with 1,000 corpses lying in it, everyone would be able to see and understand the statistic," Jones said.

After a march in Washington D.C. in 1986 in which Jones told his idea to marchers, quilts began arriving through the mail. It was then, Jones said, that he realized the responsibility he was assuming.

"We were excited until we realized each one of these packages was a person," Jones said. "These strangers were putting their love into quilts, putting them in packages and sending them to San Francisco."

Jones spoke about the importance of making a quilt with family and friends.

"It is difficult to describe someone you love verbally," Jones said. "And a visual representation is very hard."

Jones said he wanted the quilts spread on the ground instead of hung vertically so people could not be separate from it or view it as they would an art work.

"For me this quilt is a monstrous, hideous thing," Jones said. He said it affected him when he was in Washington last October, "I started to feel sick, like I was going to puke every time I walked a few feet through it,"

Programs export students overseas

By JOHN WINCHELL
Collegian Staff

A pair of programs, one offered by the Mather Career Center and another by the Council on International Exchange (CIEE), offer UMass students employment programs with an international flavor.

Many people are unaware that 122 UMass students have worked in foreign countries in the two years in which the programs have been active. Marion Mallen, coordinator of the Mather Career Center's International Field Experience Program, says there is a broad range of employment opportunities to choose from.

"The jobs aren't all necessarily career-oriented, but can be for international experience, as well,"

Discharged lesbian colonel recounts life story

MATT KAHN / COLLEGIAN
Discharged lesbian soldier, Col. Margarethe Cammermeyer spoke on campus this weekend.

By ANDREW LUMB
Collegian Staff

The highest ranking military officer to be discharged for being homosexual is taking the U.S. government to court to get reinstated.

Col. Margarethe Cammermeyer, the head nurse in the Washington State National Guard until June 11, 1992, when she was "formally separated" from the military, told an audience of 25 at UMass Saturday that the life she began was a traditional one.

Joining the military at age 19, she met her husband while on a tour in Germany and gave birth to four sons, all who are now college-aged.

She said her Scandinavian parents' attitude towards homosexuality was the same as their attitude towards anything they don't want to deal with: "if you knew nothing about it, and said nothing about it, then it didn't exist." Her mother thought homosexuality was a "Freudian disorder."

Coming home from Vietnam, where she won a Bronze Star for excellent service, Cammermeyer and her husband settled down; but in 1968 she was discharged from the military when she had her first son, because of a 1961 law that barred women with dependents from serving.

Soon, however, she felt "a sense of tremendous fragmentation of feeling that wherever I was I wasn't a whole person. . . but I didn't know what it was."

During her tour in Vietnam she had noticed that some "women looked rugged," and remembers thinking "these are women that really want to be men."

She admitted to her husband that she was a lesbian, and he told her she was "mentally deranged," had a "gender-identity problem," or was in a "mid-life crisis." She finally left him because she would "hate the thought that my husband was always right."

Her ex-husband lined up her children when she came to visit them, and forced them to watch as he called her names like "faggot" and "queer," until she drove away crying.

In 1989 under a new law, Cammermeyer again applied to the military with aspirations of becoming a general, but admitted being a lesbian on a form.

She didn't think she would have a problem because of her service record, but she did have "a sinking feeling" throughout the five hours of testimony.

No response came for many months, until a notification that discharge hearings had been started. No one knew this had happened at her Washington post, but still she felt she led a "schizophrenic life," and that any day she would receive a telegram saying "you're outta there."

Finally in early 1991, the National Guard finished their investigation, having decided that she would be honorably discharged for being a "security risk" and "undermining morale."

Now Cammermeyer is spending her time in the capitol, pursuing her case and petitioning the Senate Armed Service Commitee to be a witness at their hearings.

Amnesty Int'l adds sexuality to abuse-watch

By DARIENNE HOSLEY
Collegian Staff

Amnesty International is just beginning to address persecution of gays and lesbians for their sexual orientation in its mission to free prisoners of conscience, according to a member of the group.

Paul Tighe, co-coordinator of the Amnesty International Members for Gay and Lesbian Concerns, spoke Saturday afternoon in the Campus Center. A small group attended the discussion, held as part of Lesbian/Bisexual/Gay Awareness Week.

In 1991, Amnesty International reviewed its mandate and added persecution for sexual orientation to the list of human rights abuses the organization fights against.

"It means we have a new ally in our fight for equality," Tighe said. "It essentially puts the world on notice that the international community is not going to stand for abuses against people for homosexuality."

Although Amnesty members cannot work in individual cases in their own countries, Tighe said he is involved in larger movements in the United States. AIMGLC is planning efforts to repeal sodomy laws in a number of states, and is participating in the GLB march in Washington April 25.

The organization is also helping to organize a march in Greenwich Village in June 1994, commemorating the 25th anniversary of the Stonewall riots.

In 1969, gay patrons of the Stonewall Bar resisted police raiding the bar, and the homosexual community realized their potential to be a political force.

Tim McCarthy, a self-described "queer videographer" at the discussion, said Stonewall marked "the first time we ever decided to fight before."

"We're no longer begging for tolerance, pleading for help. We took the initiative," he said.

Tighe helped release Vladimir Mirnov, a Russian arrested for sodomy, and Demit Demir, arrested in Turkey.

According to Tighe, police questioned Demir because he was a homosexual. Demir pointed out that homosexuality is not against the law set down by Kemal Ataturk, and was arrested for "insulting the memory" of Ataturk, founder and first president of the Republic of Turkey.

Amnesty International has not begun to collect statistics on human rights abuses against gays and lesbians, a source of frustration to many in the community.

"A lot of people are concerned with how slowly Amnesty International moves," Tighe said.

"Unfortunately, the process is slow. As slow as the movement has been on this, however, this has become a priority," he said.

Women find direction at EWC

Everywoman's Center program doles out information

By NICOLE BURKE
Collegian Correspondent

Telling 5-College Area women where they can go for help is the purpose of a program whose director calls it the foundation of the Everywoman's Center.

The EWC's Resource/Referal Program has been directing women to local counselors and doctors and serving as a source of women's issues information since the EWC was established in 1972, said Resourse/Refferal Program Director and 10-year EWC employee Sandy Mandel.

She said the Resource/Referral Program provides various information and resources to campus and community women in the Franklin, Hampshire and Hamden counties.

"Staff members are trained to respond to someone in crisis," Mandel said. "We want to get women to the services that they need."

Mandel said the Resource/Referral Program involves walk-ins, but more commonly call-ins of approximately 25 women a day, or 6,000 per year. She also said these calls and walk-ins go through the receptionist and then often to a staff member in the Resource/Referral Program.

"If there is an appropriate internal resource that I can refer the woman to, I will," Mandel said. "If not, outside resources are suggested."

"We're generally the first place people get referred to," said Astrid Meijer. "We answer general questions as well as refer women to outside hotlines, therapists or counselors."

Meijer said they do not just refer women to external sources, because they have numerous internal sources as well.

She said the internal resources include counseling services, the Counselor/Advocate Program, and the Educator/Advocate Program. Meijer said these programs give support and information in areas such as rape, sexual harassment, eating disorders and abuse.

The program provides a Legal Referral Book, a source that contains local legal organizations, a Health Referral Book, which includes various health-care information, and a Job Bank Book, which gives notification of numerous job openings in the area. Research files, a lending library, and a wall-size bulletin board with a calendar of events and workshops are also provided.

"We're not just for women in crisis or for women who require counseling," Meijer said. "Students come in for resources for their research papers or to browse in the library. They're looking for information to help themselves."

Mandel said the program's library contains feminist information and referral that is self-directed by women. She said there are over 2,000 books in the lending library with topics ranging from gender issues and health politics to violence against women and all books have been donated.

"We try to make every book as accessible as possible," Mandel said. "This is great for someone in the women's movement."

Meijer said the Resource/Referral Program is staffed with a combination of work study students, volunteers and interns. She said the staff organizes and updates the bulletin boards, files and library and they are also available for direct servicing or "staffing" to walk-ins or call-ins.

She said this semester's staff consists of six new members and four previous, because it usually takes about one year for the new members to get into the routine.

Nancy Patteson, a volunteer from Amherst, and Anna Bloomer, a volunteer from Northampton, have joined the Resource/Referral program this semester.

Patteson was UMass undergraduate and said she was interested in coming back to school for her master's degree and now volunteers at the EWC approximately eight hours a week.

Jones said.

Jones said the idea of using quilts for the memorial came from the memory of his grandmother comforting him by putting the same quilt on him every time he was sick.

He said the subversive nature of the quilt is its ability to bring the gay community into everyone's lives.

"You would have to be deaf, dumb, blind and wrapped in gauze not to feel the power of the gay community when you see and read the quilt," Jones said.

Jones said one of the successes of the quilt is its ability to help the gay community to grieve openly and become a part of the nation's consciousness.

"People write me and say 'you don't know how bad it is in our town, can you come with the quilts?'" Jones said.

He added, "When we read the final chapter on this disease we will see that HIV is a disease of ignorance and poverty."

The Work Abroad Program, sponsored by the CIEE, is designed to simplify and speed up the paperwork involved in allowing U.S. students to work in other countries. For a $100-125 fee, the exchange will complete your working and visa papers, plan travel arrangements and provide counseling and job placement services in the country you want to work in.

Mallen stressed the difficulty involved in securing a job overseas.

"It's hard to get a job in another country because of the complexity of the working papers," she said.

Work Abroad students are now employed in seven different countries worldwide, including Germany, France, Spain and Scotland.

The International Field Experience Program (IFEP) is more of a self-help procedure for students looking into international employment.

"It teaches students to use their own connections and resources to find a job overseas," Mallen said.

Mallen said she guides each student step-by-step through the process, from creating an international resume to writing cover letters to using five-college career center resources.

The program's goal is to have the employment arrangements already set up before the student goes to work in the country, Mallen said. IFEP students have spent time in 12 different countries working at 30 professional internships and co-ops. Some of the more exotic locations include Singapore, Armenia, Switzerland and Ecuador.

"It really is a combination of the student doing all the legwork, and me providing information and listings on available jobs," she said.

One example of a student utilizing the program's resources is a student who Mallen counseled on locating a job in France. The student was studying French and happened to be an avid bicyclist. With Mallen's help, he combined both interests to develop a job description for his resume. They are currently working out the final details for a recently located position which fits his interest.

Mallen's office, located in 16 Curry Hicks, is a satellite of the Mather Career Center placed more centrally on campus for student access. Not only does it serve as the International Field Experience Office, but it also doubles as an official branch of the Career Center, offering all the same programs and services. She said she hopes students will take advantage of the opportunities the programs give them to live and work abroad.

"I want UMass students to know that other UMass students are working in foreign countries, and they can too."

gram, so I came here," she said. "The program has since moved from the EWC, but I'm a firm believer for bringing the program back."

Bloomer said she has lived in the area for four years and often heard about the EWC and now volunteers eight hours a week to the center.

"I wanted to connect in with a woman's group," she said. "I'm using skills to volunteer time and energy while becoming active giving women information."

"The staff is really diverse," Bloomer said. "It's really a great place to come for information and a wonderful resource for women. Everyone should definitely come and check it out."

Obstacles await chancellor

Any day now the University will announce with much pomp and circumstance our new chancellor, the person who will lead this campus into the 21st century. They will tell us what a great guy (make no mistake, it will be a guy) he is, and how they have the utmost confidence in his ability to lead UMass into a new era of peace and prosperity.

Ted
CHAMBERS

The sad reality though is that our next chancellor, just like our last two, will probably be completely unprepared for the harsh realities of UMass and the bruising nature of Massachusetts politics. Initially he may show signs of vigor, but the Board of Trustees and the president's office will show him that when faced with crisis, particularly a budget crisis, the easiest thing to do is pass the buck to students and their families in tuition and fee increases.

There used to be a time when the administration and the Board of Trustees fought to preserve and protect UMass as a public institution dedicated to providing the best education possible to poor and working class residents of the state. In the 1970s and early '80s administrators got off their butts, went to Boston and worked hard lobbying legislators and governors so that UMass would be guaranteed the kind of budget it needed to provide a quality, affordable education to those of us who cannot afford Boston College, Boston University or Harvard.

But it was more than just hard work that distinguished the administrators of yesteryear from their contemporaries. They knew that "politics ain't a beanbag" and were capable of grasping one simple concept few in the president's and chancellor's offices now seem to understand: when you depend on the state legislature for funding, having influence with individual legislators is a good thing. This, of course, is so obvious that my accusation probably seems absurd. Call your state representative or senator and ask them the last time a UMass administrator called them or came to see them. Ask if they know the name of our current president or chancellor. I can tell you now most of them don't.

It was around 1988 when the budget crisis began. That's when former Chancellor Joe "I'm lookin' out for No. 1" Duffy decided it was in everyone's best interest, especially his, to not make waves about cuts in the University budget. You see, Joe didn't want to make Dukakis look bad while running for president, and more importantly, didn't want to do anything that might jeopardize his chances of getting a job in Washington had Dukakis actually won.

So Joe decided it would be easier to raise tuition and fees than it would be to fight for more money, and just about everybody in the administration and the Statehouse agreed. To justify their position they drew up a bunch of charts and plans that allegedly proved students and their families could afford to pay more to go here, and the rest, as they say, is history. Legislative and public support have eroded drastically ever since, and as a result a majority of the students of color at this campus are from out of state, and the average family income of most students is over $50,000 annually. UMass is now one of the most expensive public universities in the country. So much for educating the poor and working class residents of the Commonwealth.

Our new chancellor isn't likely to reverse the trend for a number of reasons. The first is that he will be from out of state and not temperamentally suited to the rigors of Massachusetts politics. In most other states, legislative support for public education is a foregone conclusion. States like California, Michigan and Texas have great public colleges and universities for the simple reason that they have to because in those states there are few real alternatives in the private sector. What makes Massachusetts unique is that we are the only state where private higher education is a $14 billion a year industry.

But an even larger obstacle will be the University president and the Board of Trustees, who are still trying to justify their failed policies and inaction during the last five years. These administrators believe the "budget crisis" is over, and with good economic times ahead public education will see increases in state funding. They may be right for now, but without a concerted effort by the administration to build and sustain legislative support over the next few years, UMass will be ill-prepared for future budget crises and history will unfortunately repeat itself.

Abusers control with fear

A harsh word. A slap. Kick. Punch. Slam against the wall. Bruises, low self-esteem and isolation. Apologies, presents and compliments. Another slap, kick, punch.

A woman lies stabbed on her kitchen floor. A mother lies strangled on her own bed. A daughter lies shot in her living room. The sisters lie dead from domestic violence.

Stacy
MALONE

A woman is battered every 15 seconds. That is four women a minute who are battered and 240 women in an hour. As you are reading this, a women is being beaten.

Many of these women may be your friends, family members or even your partner. If you feel helpless in aiding victims of domestic violence, imagine what it would be like if you were the victim. Then again, maybe you are the victim.

Women in violent relationships are not alone. They never deserve to be hit, threatened or beaten, but they are.

The power and control involved in domestic violence subjects women to emotional, psychological, physical, sexual and economic abuse. Emotionally, women are under constant manipulation. They are criticized, insulted, given the silent treatment, made to feel guilty and worthless. Psychologically, they are intimidated, threatened, harassed, isolated and instilled with fear.

Physical abuse in domestic relationships inflicts women with slapping, kicking, punching, pinching, hair-pulling, biting, shoving, grabbing and many different forms of physical injuries. The forcing of drugs, withholding of food, sleep and medication are also forms of physical domestic abuse that women suffer constantly as part of their violent relationships with their partners.

Attempts to undermine a person's sexuality is sexual abuse. Marital and acquaintance rape, forced sex, prostitution and pornography are all acts of sexual abuse. Accusations of infidelity and criticism of sexual performance are very typical in domestic violence that women undergo as part of their daily routines.

The economic abuse in domestic violence attempts to make women financially dependent on their partner. Maintaining complete control of the money gives the batterer power over the victim. Withholding money, accounting for all money spent, forbidding the victim from working and going to school gives the batterer power while weakening the victim.

The power and control that such has over women in battering relationships is intense abuse women feel every day. This abuse leaves most women financially dependent, ashamed that the marriage didn't work out, afraid, embarrassed, guilty, helpless, afraid of having no father for their children or losing their children and afraid of worse beatings and abuse.

It is the realistic fears and dependency that keeps women with an abusive partner.

Violence against women by their husbands, boyfriends, lovers and relatives happens every day to all types of women. Domestic violence is not isolated to certain types of victims and batterers.

Some women are battered and others are raped, but all live with the daily fear of attack. The violation of a woman's body and her life happens all the time.

While you feel sorry for the thousands and thousands of victims of domestic violence, look at yourself because you too may be a victim of domestic violence.

Subtle racism is very dangerous

This is not another race-obsessive response to a column containing the word "minority." I didn't like Michael Morrissey's editorial [Collegian, April 2]. At first I wasn't quite sure why. On the surface Mr. Morrissey's writing seems to make valid points concerning the credibility of a UMass degree and personal safety on campus.

However, on a deeper level, Morrissey's connection of violent crime and low standards with minority students should be incredibly offensive to any thinking person. Morrissey's column quietly cried "there goes the neighborhood" to a student population already inundated with racial stereotypes. I would gladly sacrifice the credibility of my degree if it meant that more minorities could have the opportunity to obtain higher education.

Michael Morrissey may have thought his editorial to be a call for the maintenance of excellence at UMass but in reality the column was elitist, exclusionist and racist (pardon the cliche). I understand that Morrissey probably didn't intend any harm in his editorial. The idea that this kind of subtle, unintentional racism is harmless is what makes it so very dangerous.

Open mind needed in struggle for equality

As a freshman at a university where there are supposedly "educated, mature young adults," I figured I would be just another guy living a normal college life.

I guess I was wrong about the educated, mature thing. Is it just me or are there people out there who just want to stir up trouble?

Reading Nathan Crick's editorial [Collegian, March 31], I laughed a little at the beginning. We've all been through the annoying little things of which he wrote.

Then suddenly he jumps to a Rodney King critique. Yeah, I think the cops were wrong, but that's not for me or Nathan to decide. A jury was agreed upon, and even though millions of people didn't like it, myself included, that's what they found.

After Nathan's opinion he returned to his light-hearted column on college life. But wait, he wasn't finished; he had to pull out another racial comment. I'm sure he's got plenty.

Let me tell you something, Nathan: if you think anyone, including people wearing ally pins, only want to be friends with someone because of their color, you better give up the racial equality struggle, because you're not helping anyone. The pins are there as a symbol, to show our support for the cause, not to make friends.

This really confuses me: "Let me be your friend, even though I'm White." What the hell does that mean? Racism goes both ways, and no matter what way you look at it, that's an incredibly racist statement.

I'm a White guy from a town where Whites are a minority. Less than half my friends are White. The rest are Black, Hispanic. . . whatever you want, we got it. I don't see myself being shut out by them.

I think it's you who needs to sit back with an open mind and really think about it. With a mentality like that, you're not going to get anywhere.

If you ever change your outlook and would like to have a real friend who's White, give me a call. Maybe I'll do it.

About letters

As you bask in the sun, thoughtfully composing your letter to the Collegian and ducking frisbees, please keep the following in mind:

- Type your letter — handwritten letters hurt our eyes, and we avoid them.
- Keep your letter short — 50 lines is the maximum. So you can write up a brief but brilliant letter and still have time to play.
- Sign your name, address and phone number. This is very, very important. If we don't know who you are, you don't exist. If you don't exist, you don't write. . .
- You can mail your letter via campus mail, but you're welcome to drop it off in the editorial box at the Collegian, 113 Campus Center basement. You can't see the sun down here, but it's still a nice place to visit.

Somalia's hegemony doomed from beginning

Asaf
MOHAMED

Since 1988, a bloody civil war has devastated Somalia, which led to the overthrow of President Mohamed Siad Barre in late January 1991, and to the disintegration of the state. Though the three major rebel groups collaborated to oust the 21-year authoritarian regime, there is still tremendous distrust and infighting. The failure of rebel groups to share power and form a viable government fueled a new full-scale clan-based struggle for power which has claimed lives of thousands and sent hundreds of thousands of refugees to every corner of the globe. Most of them sought safe haven in the neighboring countries, but the number of people displaced locally far out number those who sought refugee abroad. Now, drought, famine and starvation have claimed hundreds of thousands more.

At this junction, it's necessary to look at the root causes of the current disintegration and destitution of Somalia.

Somalis form one of the largest single ethnic group in Africa, yet they are divided into two major lineage groupings: the Samaale and the Sab. The Somali nation is widely dispersed but live in a "continuous occupation of a great expanse of territory covering almost 40,000 square kilometers." (I.M. Lewis, 1955:167) This territory extends from the northeastern tip of the Horn of Africa below the Arabian Peninsula to the Aqash Valley in the northwestern (now under Ethiopian Administration), southward from DJibouti and along the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean coast down to the Tana River in northern Kenya. Despite externally imposed divisions all the Somalis share a common ethnic background and culture — one language (Somali) and one religion (Islam) — as well as one socio-economic lifestyle and values derived from pastoralism.

The root causes of the present crises can be attributed to the inheritance of the colonial legacy. Historically, for centuries, before the arrival of European colonial powers, Somalis lived under decentralized, clan-based political systems practicing what has been termed 'pastoral democracy.' The unity of the Somali community or nation has been maintained by the relative homogeneity of civil society rather than by a centralized state. This system had social, economic, and political significance of the pastoral culture that Somalis practice.

The Somalis' indigenous system became tainted with new political and economic structures brought in by external forces. Colonial powers, and later the superpowers, contended for the control of the area. Though the Somali country is not generously endowed with riches and natural resources, its strategic location in close proximity to the Suez Canal, a vital route to India and the Far East, attracted the attention of world powers long before the discovery of oil in the Middle East. The Somali peninsula experienced intensive colonial competition and partition between Britain, Italy, France and imperial Ethiopia. The indigenous economic, political and social systems of the Somali nation have been replaced with alien colonial models.

In July 1960, the newly independent Somalian establis'ed a centralized government and a multi party political system of representation. The constitution guaranteed political parties the freedom to organize and compete for political office. As years passed, nation-oriented political parties degenerated into clan, sub-clan and even one-man parties. These systems of government have brought confusion and chaos, because traditionally the Somali person first reserves the greatest amount of loyalty to his/her own kinship, after that to his/her wider clan group(s), and finally to the Somali nation.

On Oct. 21, 1969, the armed forces successfully staged a bloodless coup d'etat headed by Gen. Mohammed Siad Barre. By the time of the coup Somalia was still an extremely divided nation, with Pan-Somalism remaining the most common ideal behind which every Somali could rally. Immediately, the coup d'etat was received by Somalis with great excitement and relief. The SRC, made up of military officers but also relying on a number of civilians to hold ministerial portfolios, had mobilized the people's support through successive campaigns to investigate theft perpetrated by former government officials and cabinet members. In a short period, the revolutionary government achieved a remarkable record of success.

While the above is to the credit of the revolution, an ample amount of evidence exists to indicate that, in reality, clan and lineage ties still weighed heavily in Siad's political decisions and appointments. The previous regimes were able to deal with clanism through open multiparty parliamentary representation. In contrast, Siad resorted to favoritism, rewarding his supporters with prestige and wealth. He imposed a severe military dictatorship and denied citizens a right to freedom of expression as a means to quell dissidents. A national security court, headed by military officers, was created to suppress opponents of the revolution.

In times of stress in any country's history, tensions and divisions widen. Subsequent challenges to Barre's leadership were almost invariably organizationally clan-based. Trust became the bonding factor rather than ideas. Barre had to rely more on his wider family, including his clansmen who were military men rather than politicians. The enemies of Barre's leadership and their home districts were devastated. Among the first clan to challenge and suffer was the Majerteen, who were prominant in the civilian governments of the '60s. The rebellion of Isaaks in the North revealed the depths to which Barre and his army were prepared to go to exterminate any dissidence. A genocide unprecedented in the history of the Somali clan warfare occured in 1988. Isaaks, pressed by Barre's truce with Mengistu of Ethiopia, their principal supporter, attacked major towns in the North. Barre reacted without restraint, his army had practically levelled Hargeisa, the nation's second capital city, and other towns in the North were rocketed and bombed.

By late 1990, Barre's secret politics of divide and rule broke down. At home he simply ran out of clans, as many deserted him. Finally, his palace was overran in early January 1991.

Unfortunately, the opposition groups, instead of sharing the leadership, fought over it, and sparked a clannish civil war.

Somalis had failed to achieve political development and unity to build a strong nation-state. Externally, Somalis are victim of colonial legacy and the Cold War. Superpowers exploited the Somalis' desire for unification by selling them arms in exchange for their strategic interests. Today, unfortunately, the only things found in abundance in Somalia are the weapons that have killed more than 100,000 Somalis. The destruction and negligence of the indigenous political system has caused confusion and chaos resulting in present tragic situation. In the meantime, since the end of the Cold War, those who contributed to this tragic situation have turned backs on the Somali people.

Asaf Mohamed is a UMass student.

Underground water found; natural supply for desert

DHAHRAN, Saudi Arabia (AP) — Saudi scientists have disputed claims by a Boston Univeristy professor that a dry river bed running through Saudi Arabia and Kuwait could still hold precious underground water.

Bakr A. Bakr, rector of King Fahd University of Petroleum and Minerals, said Sunday his researchers' report refuted the analysis of Farouk El-Baz, director of the Center for Remote Sensing at Boston University.

Bakr told a news conference there was nothing new about El-Baz's revelations on March 25 that a river had flowed through the kingdom and Kuwait some 11,000 years ago.

El-Baz had suggested the river could be tapped for agriculture in a region rich in oil but heavily dependent on desalinated seawater for drinking and irrigation.

Bakr said there are references to the river in surveys dating back to 1606. He said his university had carried out numerous studies on the river bed in 1978, 1984 and 1990 and concluded there was nothing to tap.

He railed against the Egyptian-born scientist, saying: "It is not the first time El-Baz made such big claims without checking their accuracy and confirming the authenticity of his discoveries."

El-Baz was out of the United States on Monday and unavailable for comment.

But his research assistant in Boston, Magaly Koch, said El-Baz had only suggested there might be water. She said extensive drilling or ground-penetrating radar might settle the issue, but had not been done yet.

"The main point is, it's still not proven if there's water, but there's the possibility," Koch said. "How can they be sure?"

El-Baz had said the river, which he called the Kuwait River, was discovered as he and a team of graduate students examined the impact of sand and silt stirred up by military vehicles during the Gulf War.

Satellite images, he said, showed that two separate dry valleys — the Wadi al Batin and the Wadi al-Rimah — once connected to form the peninsula's largest river, flowing for 530 miles and up to three miles wide.

The gravel was carried by rushing water from the mountains and created two thirds of the land mass of Kuwait.

El-Baz said it was not clear how much water remained underground but it would have been replenished by occasional rain draining from the mountains.

Before El-Baz's report, a professor at the Bahrain-based Gulf beds in the peninsula, but that they had grown saline with use through the centuries.

The professor, Shehta al-Khateeb, warned against exaggerated reports on water supplies in the region, saying these would complicate water-sharing talks launched as part of multilateral negotiations complementing the Arab-Israli peace process.

"Data on water must be practical and must not be exaggerated because the coming conflict in the region will be about resources and water and not oil." al-Khateeb said.

Cloud Nine
The Curtain Theatre
April 3

Even those who do not share my conviction that "Cloud Nine" is the finest Theatre Department presentation since "Tales of the Lost Formicans" 14 months ago should feel obliged to cheer the show for providing us with the first female playwright and female leads of the semester. After 10 weeks of male-dominated theatre, it was both refreshing and relieving to see female characters who acted as more than complements to more-important male roles.

In a way, this is what Caryl Churchill's play is all about: the development of self-identity and the arbitrary nature of gender roles. Everyone in this show has a keenly different personality and, aside from the vacant, grinning patriarch (Michael Lombardi), everyone is impressed with the importance of hiding behind the accepted facades of wife, son, servant, etc.

This game of deception is presented, at first, as a comic sex farce — a family of buffoons in colonial Africa act out dreary lives with dreary persistence while engaged in countless deceits and affairs. Sex and love are unifying factors between these characters since every one is transgressing some unwritten law in search of happiness. Adultery, homosexuality, lesbianism, bi-racial sex and numerous combinations thereof, all lurk beneath the surface of Victorian tranquility.

Churchill, and UMass director Michael Tritto, make the necessity of hiding sexuality seem even more unreasonable by casting a towering man (Micah Hollingsworth) as the submissive, cultured wife, and a petite young woman (Laurie Ciarametaro) as the butch, and secretly gay, son.

But for all the farcical absurdity of this first act, it is the dramatically simple second act which does more to promote the understanding of social and sexual differences. The stories of act one are continued, transplanted to modern-day England, but the actors have all traded roles. The gay son still performs love scenes with men, but he is no longer played by a woman — the heterosexuality safety net is gone.

Yet although a few closed-minded people clambered for exits, the majority of the audience remained with the characters, and learned not only to accept them but to finally cheer for their liberation.
– Shawn McDonnell

It was interesting to note the shock that the audience (who cheered and hooted at heterosexual oral sex in act one) expressed at something as simple as a kiss between men. Yet although a few closed-minded people clambered for exits, the majority of the audience remained with the characters, and learned not only to accept them but to finally cheer for their liberation.

In one particularly rueful scene of memory, the newly-open gay man (Hollingsworth) is confronted by the image of his first act self (Ciaramento) and by the question of whether his lifestyle was worth the sacrifice of safety and home. It is a scene full of yearning and pain, and one that is so beautifully played by the actors that even the staunchest homophobe cannot help but be moved.

Equally impressive is the thunderous finale (featuring a beautiful score by Peter Fernandez) in which all pretensions are finally dropped and the cast joins in a weirdly cosmic song of hope for the future entitled, "Life Will be Fine When We Reach Cloud Nine." The sad poignancy of this conclusion is that the eternally repressed matron (Ciarametaro), left alone on-stage after her only true moment of abandon, can do nothing more than fastidiously restore her hair and clothing. . . and hope that nobody saw.

It is truly a shame that a show so artfully understated in word and in thought would resort to following this finale with a manipulative and overwrought epilogue. Forcing happy endings on the characters (most of which ring false) seems to undermine the very purpose of the play by saying, "hey, everything is all right after all.

But this gem is only slightly less impressive because of its flaws, and the strengths of a brilliant cast and crew outweigh any of my grumbly complaints. Particularly impressive is the work of Ciarametaro and Hollingsworth who share the evening's two leads. Although physically dissimilar, the performers play off each other so adroitly that when they trade characters in act two, the transition is nearly seamless.

Combining this ace cast (which also includes the consistently excellent acting of Lombardi, Jen Costello and Rob Corddry) with the soft touch of director Tritto and the whimsy of designers Terry Becket and Ulises Alcala, it is hard to come up with anything less than a winner.

Remaining performances of 'Cloud Nine' are April 6-10, 8 p.m. at the Curtain Theatre. Tickets are available from the FAC Box Office.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Create a climate of generosity today and others will volunteer to assist you. A money tree could blossom if you nurture it. Expect the unexpected in romance.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): It may be best to fly solo today. Out-of-town business associates provide helpful information. Live in the moment and drop any bullying tactics.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Decide what is really important to you and your future — then go after it! Events at work could prove irritating. Look for financial aid from other sources. Romance is itty.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Guard against "foot-in-mouth" mistakes. Greet and treat the higher-ups with great respect. You can relax your defenses tonight with your family. Have fun without wrecking your bank account.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Useful information comes from confidential sources today. Trust your instincts; you are right on target. Examine merchandise carefully if buying sales items.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Doing something out of the ordinary could lead to something extraordinary! Follow your instincts if an investment seems right. Returning to a sensible diet and exercising work wonders.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Luck and love smile on you now. A guest may ignite romantic fireworks or rekindle old embers. The comforts of home will soothe you tonight. Seek healthy, relaxing pastimes.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Take the initiative on matters dear to your heart; your enthusiasm will win support along the way. A mystery may be solved with pleasing results. Someone who lives close to you is acting uncharacteristically.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): An unexpected breakthrough can make this a golden day. In domestic matters, your intuition is right on target. Romantic bliss hinges on how you handle a new relationship.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Stubborn people are suddenly open to suggestions. New happiness results. Your ability to interpret a loved one's body language is a big help. Start a savings plan.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Recent tribulations should be behind you. Moves, transfers and promotions are on the horizon. Have patience. Consider taking a brush-up course at a local college.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): All systems are "go" today. Pay close attention to details and make sure that your work is letter perfect. Higher-ups view your efforts with approval.

The Coordinating Dean of Arts and Sciences, Dr. Lee Edwards, and Nu Chapter of Phi Beta Kappa are pleased to announce new members elected from the Junior and Senior classes. Phi Beta Kappa is the oldest and most prestigious American honor society in the Liberal Arts. It was founded at the College of William and Mary on December 5, 1776. Yale's chapter was formed in 1780, Harvard's in 1781. During the next century additional chapters of Phi Beta Kappa were added and in 1883 a national organization called the United Chapters of Phi Beta Kappa was created. At present, only 237 liberal arts colleges or universities have been accredited by the national organization and permitted to form chapters. In New England only six public institutions are so recognized.

Candidates do not apply for membership nor is application made on their behalf. They are nominated by the chapter's faculty members on the basis of their academic records as shown on their transcripts. Candidates must be majors in one of the three faculties of the College of Arts and Sciences and must satisfy certain grade point, foreign language, and distribution requirements set by the national organization. Approximately 3% of Seniors with the strongest academic records are elected each year; one half of 1% of Juniors are selected.

Minutemen drop 2 of 3 to A-10 foe GW

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Like a boxer who has his opponent on the ropes but is unable to register a knockout, the University of Massachusetts baseball team had the George Washington University Colonials staggered, but was unable to drop them.

The Minutemen (6-7, 2-3 A-10) slaughtered the Colonials 12-0 in the Atlantic 10 series opener, but were unable to KO them for good. Instead, GW recovered, taking the next two 6-1 and 13-7.

George Washington (8-12, 3-4), which had lost 10 in a row going into the series, rebounded with wins Sunday and Monday. The series was pushed ahead one day due to inclement weather.

The Minutemen, playing for the first time in one week, showed no signs of lethargy in their 12-0 victory. The team pounded out 14 hits, including four by left fielder Justin Howard. Other offensive stars included catcher Jeff January (2 home runs, 5 runs batted in), second baseman Mark Pileski (3 for 4, 2 runs, 2 RBI) and third baseman Jeff Creamer, who went 2 for 4.

The real star, however, was ace right-hander Jeff Toothaker, who (3-2) allowed only six hits and two walks in seven innings, and struck out five.

He had solid support in the field, as the UMass defense committed only one error. Toothaker lowered his earned run average to 3.60 on the year with the victory.

The Minutemen full intended to kick GW while they were down. But the defending A-10 champions regrouped, thanks to right-hander Rich Rosenberg.

Rosenberg (2-0) threw a two-hitter, and the Minutemen plated their only run in the fifth, when the outcome was still in doubt. When Andy Pelis singled off Rosenberg, scoring Bill Knight, UMass was down 2-1.

The Colonials came back with one in the fifth and three in the sixth to put things away. Jim Telgheder (2-2) took the loss.

The Minutemen needed the victory Monday to stay above .500, but GW scored in every inning but the second in the 13-7 win.

Greg Patton, the Colonials' leading hitter, went 3-for-5 with 4 RBI. His two-run homer in the first inning put GW up for good. Bryan Urda and Scott Sharp also hit dingers for the Colonials.

The Minutemen collected 10 hits on offense, with Howard, Greg LaRocca and Keith Richards combining for 5 hits and 3 RBI, but they never had enough to challenge the Colonials, who walked away with the victory and the edge in the three-game series.

Women's tennis returns

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team officially returned to action splitting their first two matches of the year. UMass made their 1993 debut a successful one last Thursday, pounding Mt. Holyoke College 6-3. In their second outing, the Minutewomen suffered defeat at the hands of the University of Vermont, 6-3.

Against Holyoke, four of the six UMass singles players were victorious. The Minutewomen doubles tandems did their job as well with two of the three teams registering victories.

Freshman Liesl Sitton played first singles for UMass and she showed why as Sitton blasted Holyoke's Julia Lenfers 6-0, 6-1. At second singles for UMass, junior Stacey Scheckner fell to Shelley Bogard in a tight match 7-6, 6-4.

In a tough three set match, Minutewoman Leslie Watts, a junior, fought past Cathy Brennan in the third singles match 6-4, 2-6, 7-6.

UMass captain, junior Pam Levine, was unable to get past Jen Howe at fourth singles and fell 6-0, 6-3. At the fifth singles slot for the Minutewomen, sophomore Alissa Cohen steadied her way past Stacy Derderian 6-4, 6-2. Rounding out the singles play, UMass' number six singles player, senior Kelly Grim breezed by Natalie Meyer 6-1, 6-1.

In doubles play, the first doubles tandem for UMass, Sitton and Watts, came from behind to defeat Cathy Brennan and Shelley Bogard, 6-7, 6-4, 6-4.

At second doubles, UMass' team of Levine and Scheckner fell to Julia Lenfers and Jen Howe 6-4, 6-2. Rounding out the doubles action, UMass' third doubles team of Alex Torres and Mary Edwards defeated Stacy Derderian and Natalie Meyer 6-3, 6-3.

In Vermont, the Minutewomen split their six singles matches but lost all three doubles encounters. Sitton moved to 2-0 on the season as she walloped Tara Pepin 6-0, 6-0.

At the No. 2 single spot, UMass' Scheckner was defeated by Cathy Kuebler 6-1, 6-1. Leslie Watts was unable to get by Vermonts' Julia Renstrom at third singles slot, as Watts fell 6-1, 6-2.

UVM's Becky Sohn beat UMass' Levine at fourth singles, 6-2, 6-2. At both the No. 5 and 6 singles spots, UMass players moved to 2-0 with victories at Vermont. Alissa Cohen rallied past Lisa Johnson at the No. 5 spot in three sets, 6-2, 2-6, 6-4. Kelly Grim, at the No. 6 spot, blasted Sharon Eberhard 6-3, 6-0.

In doubles action, UMass' first tandem of Sitton and Watts fell to Tara Pepin and Lisa English in a three set affair 1-6, 6-3, 6-4. At No. 2 doubles, the Minutewomen pair of Levine and Sheckner fell to Vermont's Lisa Johnson and Sharon Eberhard 7-6, 6-4.

In the third doubles encounter, UMass' Cohen and Grim lost in a tight three setter, 4-6, 6-2, 6-4.

Softball sweeps Bonnies

Minutewomen win pair, host BC today

By SEAN P. HAYDEN
Collegian Staff

After two weeks of being confined to Totman Gym, the University of Massachusetts softball team successfully opened the Atlantic 10 season by taking out its aggression on a winless St. Bonaventure squad, crushing the Lady Bonnies and sweeping both ends of a double header yesterday at the University of Rhode Island.

The Minutewomen cruised in the first game, winning by a 10-0 score and only needing five innings to hand St. Bonaventure their seventh loss of the season. The second game was much like the first, with UMass again winning handily, this time by a 9-0 count.

UMass (4-9 overall, 2-0 in the A-10) proved the best defense is a good offense by pounding out 27 hits in the two games.

In the first game, sophomore Kelly Daut recorded her second win of the season, while registering her first shutout of the year. Daut struck out eight and walked only one in five innings in upping her record to to 2-5. Kelley McMordia suffered the loss for St. Bonaventure.

After taking a 1-0 lead in the first inning, the Minutewomen broke the game wide open with seven runs in the third, and iced it with two more in the fifth.

Senior catcher Sherri Kuchinskas led the 13-hit attack for coach Elaine Sortino's squad by going 3-for-3 at the plate with a double. Junior second baseman Tracey DuEst (3-for-3) and sophomore center fielder Heather Dorsey (2-for-2) also contributed to the cause.

The nightcap was a game of milestones for the Minutewomen, namely senior righthander Darlene Claffey and Kuchinskas. In earning her second victory of the season and 43rd of her career, Claffey (2-4) moved into third place on the UMass all-time wins list. Claffey struck out five in four innings. Freshman Dana Colla worked three innings of relief for Sortino and struck out two.

Kuchinskas was again the key figure offensively for UMass as she went 2-for-4 with a double and two runs scored. Her double, the 31st of her career, moved her into second place on the all-time doubles list while also putting her third on the UMass all-time extra base hit list with 47.

Kuchinskas did not do it alone though. Freshman shortstop Amy Powell and senior left fielder Stacey Nichols both went 2-for-2 with two runs scored apiece.

This time a five-run third inning and a four-run fourth spelled defeat for the Lady Bonnies (0-8 overall, 0-6 in the A-10) and losing pitcher Sheila Maloney.

The layoff apparently did not hurt UMass defensively, as the Minutewomen committed just one error in the two games.

Today, field conditions permitting, the Minutewomen will host Big East member Boston College at 3 p.m. at Totman Field.

The Eagles (7-5 overall, 3-3 in the Big East) are bolstered by a strong pitching staff with the likes of Tricia Murray and Kelli Weaver. Murray is 5-1 with a 0.92 earned run average in 38 innings pitched and Weaver is 2-4 with a 1.63 ERA in 38 and two-thirds innings. Shortstop Julie Obear leads BC offensively with a .448 batting average, one home run, and five runs batted in.

New York Knicks keep on winning, fighting on the court

On the weekend of Wrestlemania, the New York Knicks decided they would continue the tradition of the wrasslers by engaging in yet another brawl. New York clawed and elbowed its way, literally, to a 123-107 victory over Miami last Friday, ending the Heat's 12-game home winning streak.

NOTES FROM THE HARDWOOD
by Art Stapleton

Well, Patrick Ewing threw a Greg "The Hammer" Valentine-like elbow to the jaw of Grant Long, creating a huge gash that needed four stitches. Later in the game, players from both teams started shoving each other on the court.

In a scene similar to when "Rowdy" Roddy Piper smashed a pineapple and a coconut over the head of "Superfly" Jimmy Snuka in Piper's Pit, Miami police officers were called onto the scene to restore order. Hey, I could've sworn that Tony Garea, Rene Goulet, and Pat Patterson were dressed up as cops that night, but I can't be sure.

Anyway, the Knicks keep on winning, along with their rivals for the No. 1 spot in the Eastern Conference, the Bulls. Chicago beat up on the Celtics on national television on Sunday, led by a sparkling defensive effort by who else but Michael Jordan.

Jordan limited Reggie Lewis to 11 points on 4 for 18 shooting. Reggie had been averaging over 30 points in his last two games.

In all fairness to Boston (I can't believe I just wrote that), the C's have had a tough time against the three best teams in the NBA. Three in a row against Phoenix (a loss on Friday), Chicago, and an upcoming game tonight against the Knicks will surely test everybody's favorite team.

One thing I can't understand, getting back to Basketbrawl, is why haven't the Celtics turned to the fighting ways of the Knicks. Last season, the roughhouse tactics of the Knickerbockers were blamed on the presence of the X-Man. He is not there anymore, so everyone should shut up and blame someone else. How about John Starks and Greg Anthony? (This is not supposed to relate to the movie Singles at all. O.K., maybe it is).

Up-and-coming Nuggets?

Denver is a team rarely anybody cares about, but the Nuggets are on the way up. With Chris Jackson, Dikembe Mutombo, and LaPhonso Ellis leading the way, the Nuggets have won six of their last eight, including a 120-94 drubbing of the Timberwolves, who are travelling in the opposite direction.

All of this winning still leaves Denver 10 games under .500, so it really doesn't look like Dan Issel's club will make the dance. If they did, the Nuggets would probably get pounded by the Suns in the first round.

Even if Denver doesn't make the playoffs, it seems as though it has the young talent base to stay on the rise. These kids can flat-out play (My best Dick Vitale imitation when I have nothing else more to say).

March Madness is history.

At the moment you are reading this column, the NCAA tournament is over. Finito. Kaput. The next question regarding college hoops is who will enter the NBA draft and who will stay in school. So far, studs such as Anfernee Hardaway and Jamal Mashburn have said adieu to Memphis State and Kentucky, respectively, and have thrown their hats into the ring of the NBA.

Appropriately, the first thing these guys will receive in the league is a new hat of the team that drafts them.

It is time to inform the readers that I will be leaving the University to partake on a two-year mission, in order to get in shape for the NBA. I figured if Shawn Bradley, a guy who probably hasn't played the sport for two years, can leave school and try to join the NBA, I can too. Why not?

I guess it has to do with the fact that he is 7-foot-7.

Did you see that?

• Joe Dumars scoring 73 points in his last two games, against Portland and Sacramento.

ANC violence must cease, says leader

By BARRY RENFREW
Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG — Nelson Mandela pleaded with his followers Tuesday to refrain from violence, admitting that ANC members are partly responsible for bloody Black factional fighting.

Mandela, president of the African National Congress, urged his supporters to show tolerance for their political opponents, such as the Inkatha Freedom Party.

The ANC often blamed the political violence that has killed thousands in recent years on its Black and White opponents, repeatedly accusing government security forces and Inkatha of instigating the fighting.

But Mandela conceded during a speech at a political rally that the ANC is not blameless in its battles with members of Inkatha, also known as the IFP.

"I'm not going to blame the IFP and the government only. We must face the truth — our people are just as involved in violence," he said.

Mandela's statement appeared aimed at restraining his more radical supporters. He also wants to attract support and votes from outside the ANC by projecting a more moderate image as South Africa moves toward multiracial democracy.

Back and White leaders are deeply concerned the violence will make it difficult to hold elections and end White-minority rule. Political parties agreed in resuming constitutional talks last week that ending violence was a top priority, but they could not agree on what needed to be done.

Mandela told 2,000 supporters in the Black township of Mamelodi outside Pretoria to condemn ANC followers responsible for violence. He said people involved in senseless killings were "animals" and would not be tolerated in the ANC.

He made the remarks at a burial ceremony for Solomon Mahlangu, a member of the ANC's military wing who was executed in 1979 after being convicted in a double killing.

Mahlangu, who had been buried in another township, was reburied Tuesday with full ANC honors near his home in Mamelodi.

Mandela warned that the ANC could lose elections unless it organizes broad support. He said the organization could not afford to be complacent.

"You must not take for granted that we are going to win. If you rely on numbers only you will be disappointed," he told the crowd.

The ANC the biggest Black political group, is widely expected to win the first general elections in which Blacks will vote for the first time.

The White minority government is negotiating with the ANC and other political groups on a new constitution.

Honorary degrees given

Famous biologists to receive UM title

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

Three of the world's leading evolutionary biologists will attend a special convocation at the University of Massachusetts to receive honorary degrees.

The convocation is titled "Celebrating Evolution — The Central Paradigm of Science." Each professor will deliver a brief lecture after which they will be awarded their degrees.

Ernst Mayr is the Alexander Agassiz professor of zoology emeritus at Harvard University. G. Lebyard Stebbins is a emeritus professor of genetics at the University of California at Davis.

Edward O. Wilson is the Frank B. Baird Jr. professor of science at Harvard. He is a two time Pulitzer prize-winning author of Insect Societies, Sociobiology: The New Synthesis and On Human Nature, Genes, Minds, and Cultures.

COURTESY HARVARD UNIVERSITY
Science professor Edward O. Wilson is one of three biologists being awarded honorary degrees by the University. Wilson teaches at Harvard and is a two-time winner of the Pulitzer Prize.

Between the three men they have published over 1,200 scientific works and over 30 books. They have all been the recipients of the Medal of Science, which was established by an act of Congress and is presented annually by the president.

They are members of the United States National Academy of Science and are all foreign members of the German Academy of Science. They are also past presidents of the Society for the Study of Evolution and Fellows of the American Academy of Science.

Wilson and Mayr are members of the Royal Society of England and Stebbins is a members of the Royal Swedish Academy.

Mayr has received honorary degrees from Oxford University, Cambridge University, Harvard University, Yale University, the University of Munich and other leading institutions across the world. Stebbins founded the genetics department at UC-Davis.

The convocation is sponsored by the proposed new graduate program in Organismic and Evolutionary Biology.

Mayr and Stebbins, at nearly 90 years old, are the only living founders of the modern synthetic theory of evolution known as Neo-Darwinism.

President Michael Hooker will be on hand to award the degrees to the biologists. The ceremony will take place on April 14 at 4 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium.

The following day, Wilson will lecture on "The diversity of life" which deals with sociobiology and biodiversity.

UMass to aid economy with Springfield office

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts opened an office in the Bank of Boston Building in Springfield on Monday, as part of the University's efforts to help boost the region's economy and to make University programs more accessible to people outside of Amherst.

Steve Demski, staff director of the master of business administration and professional programs at the School of Management, said the office will make it easier for people in the Springfield area to learn more about what the University has to offer.

"The office makes the offerings of the University more accessible to that part of the state," Demski said. "It allows many individuals who are reluctant to travel all the way to Amherst an opportunity to talk with University representatives face to face."

The Mather Career Center, Department of Continuing Education, Conference Services, University Without Walls, School of Management's professional programs and the University relations unit, which oversees the campus' ties to business, are all programs planning to use the office space.

Chancellor Richard O'Brien said the office's location, at 1350 Main Street, will allow the University to work more closely with the businesses in the Springfield area.

War enters second year

Balkan conflict rages despite peace effort

By JOHN DANISZEWSKI
Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovina — The second year of ethnic war in Bosnia began Tuesday with more bad news: Military commanders of the warring factions could not arrange peace talks and thousands of refugees were barred from leaving a Serb-encircled town.

Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic also lent defiant support to Bosnia's Serb rebels in a rare news conference, warning the West against any more sanctions against Serbs.

Nine U.N. trucks brought food to Srebrenica.

Local officials in the eastern Bosnia town refused to let any women, children, sick, wounded or elderly board the trucks to leave. They argue that evacuation of the weakest makes Srebrenica more vulnerable to capture by the Serbs.

In light of Tuesday's actions, the United Nations postponed plans to get more food past Serb lines Wednesday, said Lyndall Sachs, a spokeswoman for the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees in Belgrade.

In Geneva, UNHCR spokeswoman Sylvana Foa rejected suggestions that evacuations would help Serbs consolidate control of eastern Bosnia.

"These people are desperate, they need help," Foa said.

The plight of Srebrenica prompted Bosnian government forces to pull out of U.N.-sponsored talks at Sarajevo's airport with Serb and Croat commanders.

Gen. Sefer Halilovic, commander of the mostly Slavic Muslim government forces, sent two envoys who merely read a statement explaining his stance, U.N. officials said.

Woman sues for prank

BOSTON (AP) — A man says he was exercising his right to free speech when he pasted the picture of a female colleague on top of sexually explicit centerfolds.

But the woman says the prank, done in the middle of a statewide union election, represented sexual harassment.

The issue will be decided by Suffolk Superior Court Judge J. Harold Flannery, who is hearing the unusual case this week.

In 1987, social worker David Heller clipped the portrait of Sylvia Bowman from her campaign postcard when she ran for president of Local 509 of the Service Employees International Union, the bargaining agent for 9,000 human service workers in the state.

Heller attached the portrait to photos showing naked women and circulated copies of his work in Worcester welfare office where he and Bowman worked and in other state welfare offices. He called his actions political satire.

Bowman lost the union election by 400 votes. But she sued Heller, a union steward from Webster who supported her opponent.

Heller's attorney, Dennis J. Kelly, argued in written pleadings that Bowman's lawsuit has no merit because the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 1988 that public figures may not sue political satirists for causing "emotional distress."

But Bowman's attorney, Nancy Gertner, said her client enjoyed broader protection.

"There's a difference between political satire, which is all about words, and the kind of a satire in which a woman is sexually degraded in the workplace," Gertner said.

Labor laws restrict the freedom of speech to prevent the workplace from becoming an abrasive environment, she said.

Resident Assistants Honored

The University is recognizing its dormitory resident assistants for their service and leadership to the campus during Resident Assistant Appreciation Week from April 4-10.

Resident assistants serve as live-in, part-time, student-staff members who facilitate campus living by providing services such as peer and referral counseling, educational and recreational activity planning and dormitory policy enforcement.

"The role of an RA is one of the most demanding positions in Student Affairs," Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Thomas Robinson said.

As part of RA Appreciation Week, Robinson thanked each RA with a letter of appreciation citing their contributions to the University.

Writing Prize Established

A $250 annual prize for column writing in the Massachusett Daily Collegian has been established to honor the memory of the late Robert F. Crowley, a 1982 UMass graduate, and a front-page columnist for the New Bedford Standard-Times.

Crowley, who was widely-known simply as "Rob," died two years ago in a traffic accident. He had been a reporter and editor for the Collegian as an undergraduate.

The judges for the prize will include Al Lupo, an author and Boston Globe columnist, Meredith O'Brien, reporter for the Springfield Union-News and Kendra Pratt, an information specialist for the U.S. Department of Agriculture in Washington, all University graduates, and a judge to be designated by the board of editors of the Collegian.

Applicants for the prize must be enrolled in a degree program at the University. Submissions must be copies of columns written during the applicant's academic career at the University.

The deadline for submissions this year is April 23, with the winner to be announced in early May.

Submissions may be sent to Crowley Prize Committee, care of Professor Howard M. Ziff, Journalism Department, Bartlett Hall, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, MA, 01003. They should include the date on which they appeared. The committee urges that photocopies, not originals, be submitted and said it would not take responsibility for returning the copies.

UMass Students Receive Career Expo Awards

Two UMass undergraduates recently received $1,000 scholarships at the twenty-first Annual Career Expo Scholarship Conference.

Yem Lip and Farhad Ahad, who are affiliated with the United Asia Learning Resource Center, received two of the 10 scholarships awarded.

The Career Expo Planning Committee plans, promotes and presents Career Expo, a job and career fair, and provides financial assistance to college students of color. The organization is run by volunteers, who represent colleges and universities, business and industry, government and community agencies, based in Boston.

The participating companies make presentations and interview students. The awards are based on the student's academic performance, leadership abilities, involvement with their community and an interview. Applicants must have a 3.0 grade point average to be eligible.

Research Office Celebrates Anniversary

The Student Affairs Research and Information Systems (SARIS) has been polling and researching and reporting student attitudes on everything from AIDS awareness to Zen meditation.

SARIS began during the early 1970s because administrators and faculty members wanted to understand the views of a student population which was involved in unrest and activism. Administrators felt at the time that there was no way of scientifically tapping into student opinion, with few students participating in student government elections, and only a few people with specific agendas attending community forums.

Library tutoring center to open

Service to offer computer and personal assistance

By KENDRA WILLETT
Collegian Staff

Providing professional assistance not already available here at the University of Massachusetts will be the goal of a new learning center which will be located in the Tower Library.

Next year, on the tenth floor of the library, students who need additional help in specific areas of college learning will have access to tutors and programs which will enhance their studies.

According to Deputy Provost Norman Aitken, who proposed this idea, most other universities of the same size already have established learning centers.

"These centers combine computer-assisted learning programs with tutoring by people," Aitken said, "and UMass has never had a centralized support service for the student body."

Predominate users of the center will most likely be freshman and sophomore students who are enrolled in large lectures and find themselves needing some individual attention, Aitken said.

"Freshman are the ones who mostly need a center like this, because they may lack skills such as time management, and efficient study abilities," Aitken said.

The center will focus on a broad range of subjects, but Aitken said, it will primarily offer assistance to students with math, science, and writing skills.

"I think the response from the student body will be overwhelming," Aitken said.

After finding a director qualified to run a program like this one, the center will also set up a course that will train tutors to teach other students

As for funding for a project like this one, Aitken said the money has already been provided by the state, and there will be no increase in student fees because of the program.

"One of the most important things for students to keep in mind is that the learning center services will be provided during the same hours that the library is open," Aitken said, "Which means help is available at reasonable hours."

The center will not try to eliminate the tutoring services already available, but instead expand upon the existing services, Aitken said.

Rolling the dice for big revenue

Casino Night profits will go to brain tumor research

By DANIEL BOUCHER
Collegian Staff

Casino Night sponsors are putting their money behind higher attendance and gambling on raising $16,000 this year.

Achievable or not, that is the goal for this year's Casino night, to be held April 22 in the Campus Center Auditorium and sponsored by the Campus Center/Student Union Board of Governors.

And it is an ambitious goal since reports in the Student Activities Office show that last year's casino night raised $8,677, and the year before, $6,408.

But Dan Gordon, an at-large board member, and head producer of this year's Casino Night, said 350 people attended the event last year. If that number can be doubled, he said, then so can the revenue.

Glen Johnson, the owner of Casino Productions based in Lynn, said the theory of doubling the revenues by doubling the number of attendants is a valid one.

Casino Productions rents the gambling equipment and trains between 80 and 100 volunteers. Two training sessions will be held, the first to be two nights before Casino Night, and the other two hours before.

Gordon also said that the goal of $16,000 is "not a set-in-stone number, it's just a simple goal." He acknowledged it was optimistic, but said "that's the point."

G. Bonnie Feldman, the president of the National Brain Tumor Society headquartered in Boston, said most of the money raised by the society gets put into research grants. Last year, she said, the society awarded almost $100,000 in grants.

"We're extremely grateful to the board of governors, and to the students who participate, for giving us this opportunity," she said.

Gordon said better publicity is the key to attendance. New methods of publicizing it, he said, would be to expand the use of advertising in the Collegian, a co-sponsor of the event. He said the committee would include a public service announcement of Casino night on WHMP radio.

Gordon said the housing office has a program to distribute posters, which he said would be more efficient in hanging posters in dormitories. He said the committee was also considering putting a notice in the bulletin board for Amherst Community Television, the local Amherst cable television station.

Table tents, which are folded cards placed on the tables at the Dining Commons and throughout the Campus Center, have been used to advertise the event in the past and will be distributed again, he said.

Casino Night has been budgeted at $5,000, but Gordon said the actual cost has not been determined yet. Producing casino night last year cost about $3,000, according to records in the Student Activities Office.

In addition to the uncertain cost of advertising, Gordon said, the number of police used and tuxedos rented also factors into the cost. Four police officers worked overtime last year for Casino night.

Another new feature will be expanding the soda bar to a full non-alcoholic bar, which Gordon hopes will raise more money by selling more drinks. Gordon said he was not sure how much it would cost though, or how much it would raise.

Jurors are less willing to accept insanity plea

By TONY ROGERS
Associated Press

BOSTON — If Kenneth Seguin was not mad, what other explanation could there be?

This computer executive - home in the suburbs, no apparent problems - suddenly killed his wife and two children. But a jury refused to find him innocent by reason of insanity, and convicted him to second-degree murder.

The presiding judge, Robert Barton, was unsurprised: "I've sat on four highly publicized cases over the years where the defense in front of the jury was not guilty by reason of insanity, and never has one of them prevailed."

Jurors everywhere, fearful of rising crime and worried that dangerous criminals will go free, are reluctant to find defendants not guilty because of insanity - even when the most bizarre crimes have been committed, experts say.

"Finding someone not guilty because of their mental state is being seen as akin to getting off scot-free," said Abbe Smith, deputy director of the Criminal Justice Institute at Harvard University Law School. "It's tied directly to the fear of crime."

Some say a backlash against leniency intensified when John Hinckley was acquitted after pleading insanity in the 1981 shooting of President Reagan.

A study of 49 counties in eight states - California, Georgia, Montana, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Washington and Wisconsin - showed that between 1976 and 1987, 1 percent of the pleas in felony cases were insanity defenses, according to the American Academy of Psychiatry & the Law.

Of those nearly 9,000 cases, 26 percent of the defendants who entered such pleas were acquitted, and only 7 percent of those acquittals written by a jury, the study found.

"It's a defense of desperation," said William Moffitt, an attorney of Alexandria, Va., known for his use of the insanity defense. "It's not the defense of first resort . . . even if you have a person who you really think is out of their mind."

The insanity defense dates to 1843 in England, when Daniel M'Naghten was accused of fatally shooting Edward Drummond, the private secretary to Prime Minister Robert Peel.

M'Naghten testified that he believed Peel was the head of a conspiracy to kill him, and that this delusion prompted him to shoot Drummond. M'Naghten pleaded not guilty by reason of insanity, and, in an unpopular verdict, was acquitted.

The so-called M'Naghten rule, or variations on it, is still the legal definition of insanity in many courts. It says a defendant is legally insane if, because of a severe mental disease or defect, he cannot appreciate the consequences of his acts or tell right from wrong.

But after Hinckley was found not guilty by reason of insanity in the assassination attempt on Reagan, Congress resounded in 1984 by passing the Insanity Defense Reform Act, which place the burden of proving insanity on the defense rather than making the prosecution prove sanity.

It also banned expert witnesses, such as psychiatrists, from offering conclusions about the sanity or insanity of the defendant, allowing them to only describe a condition and let jurors decide.

The act applied only to federal courts, but many states followed suit and adopted similar measures.

Some states created review boards, much like parole boards, that take custody of people committed to institutions after a successful insanity plea. The boards oversee treatment provided and can set conditions that must be met if a person is to be released.

Film details Nazi war on 'degenerate' art

By LYNN ELBER
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Shine a light on yet another dark corner of Nazi Germany and be reminded how many ways a brutal society destroys the best of itself and its people.

"Degenerate Art," a compelling new PBS documentary, chronicles Adolf Hitler's successful effort to crush German's vibrant modern art movement and replace it with the culture of war.

The title of the film (premiering this week: check local PBS listings) refers to an infamous 1937 Nazi art exhibit of the same name in German. "Entartete Kunst."

It was a smirking, belittling presentation of some of Germany and Europe's finest artists, including Max Beckmann, Paul Klee and Wassily Kandinsky.

Paintings were hung in crowded, poorly lighted rooms. Some works were crooked, some upside down. Derisive graffiti was scrawled on the wall: "Crazy at any price." "An insult to German womanhood."

"The common person walked into the Degenerate Art show ... as a horror show, a side show. The stuff on the wall was the work of madmen," says cultural historian Sander Gilman in the documentary.

Seen by more than 3 million people as it traveled Germany and Austria, the Entartete Kunst show was part of a full-scale attack on the modern imagination, according to filmmaker David Grubin.

Modernism sought to look beyond the superficial, painting not the skin but the "bones and the sinews," as Gilman refers to it. It encouraged a critical view that was clearly dangerous to a totalitarian system.

For Hitler, himself a failed painter, the boundaries of true art were narrow and classical: "bulls and Greeks and naked broads," says Robert Hughes, art critic for Time magazine.

It could also be militaristic, serving Hitler's aim of preparing his nation for battle.

Hitler's quest to destroy moderism in painting, literature, music and film was carried out by Hoseph Goebbels, the Nazi propaganda minister.

"The Fuhrer loves art, because he himself is an artist," a nearly evangelical Goebbels tells a crowd in fascinating archival film. "Under his blessed hand, a renaissance has begun. I cry out, oh century, oh arts! What a joy to be alive!"

Ultimately, of course, millions of people died in concentration camps. Years before, writer Heinrich Heine had warned: "Where books are burned, people will be burned."

Grubin's film was made in association with the Los Angeles County Museum of Art, which organized a 1991 exhibit on the Entartete Kunst that included a partial reconstruction of its displays.

Drawing on research by museum curator Stephani Barron, the film presents touching interviews with German witnesses and relatives of the artists. Hughes' pungent obervations make the art, and the losses, vivid.

Walking the tightrope of opinions over the land of Smurf

There's a time when you sit down at these terminals and you just can't write. You sit here and stare at these ancient monochrome screens and think that all you can say is "Spring is here!" or some complete nonsense like that. I like spring. Everybody likes spring. Who cares?

So I started writing with the line, "So they're nominating another chancellor. Ho hum." It sat there for about half an hour while I considered how to explain that I didn't care who the chancellor was because they all have seemed to be the same. Joe, Richard, Bob, Jimbo, Eugene and whoever else decided to take the reigns and chant "diversity and commitment to education" until they turned blue and suddenly fell into a high-paying governmental office.

I didn't care about that enough. Nobody cares about the chancellors because nobody thinks they really do anything of worth anyway. There. One editorial down.

The litany of racial issues jogged around for about an hour, too. But you know, I don't think anyone wants to hear about it anymore. I have read so many happy feel-good articles I'd think we were living in the land of Smurfs. The only ones with bite seem to be the blind indictments by people who want to jump on the activist bandwagon and think they too can cure the world of racism.

Well, I'll tell you what. Racism is not born from a simple opinion that can be altered with rallies or pins or lectures. They do nothing but make activist people feel good. You can strut around and think you are clean of all racism in its many forms, but until you are really tested you don't know anything.

Nathan
CRICK

This society and all other societies have been built on oppression for the causes of economics, power and nationalism. It just so happens that here we have color to separate us, which just makes things easier for identification.

Pins are cute, but don't fool yourself.

Factions are a good issue too. I could take the harmless route and beat the conservatives over the head and shoulders for fun, but the only problem with that is that the only visible conservatives are slobs like Young Americans for Freedom.

All of the intelligent ones have either gone underground or claim to be Libertarian, which is now socially acceptable. It would be difficult to try picking on liberal groups, because then I'd automatically be sided with the slobs from YAF and that would just ruin everything.

I'd rather not be associated with anybody, so I guess my only option is to say nothing about anyone. YAF is an exception. I don't think I have to explain why.

So there it is. I solved the race problem, belittled the chancellorship and tried my best to criticize a couple of groups all in 65 lines. All that a good columnist is supposed to do. It took me five hours to do that, and I am tired of this computer terminal and weary of spewing my opinion out to the whole campus community.

I suppose after a while you get sick of having to walk a tightrope to make a good column without pissing off any popular and self-righteous people who are just waiting with all the UMass catchwords to lay upon you. It is such a popular game we all play, attacking and retaliating with the goal of being the most heroic and noble. I can't say I am innocent myself, but I can say I am sick of it.

I'd say we should all grow up, but I'm afraid that would be useless. This is about as grown up as it gets, folks.

So there.

I'm a romantic — sue me

I've got a pretty serious confession to make here today.

In the turbulent wake of these annoying PC days I'm probably going to end up catching all kinds of hell about this. I'll get calls and letters assuring me that I'm a maladjusted cretin, people will want me fired from the paper and demand my entrails be served on a silver platter. It will be Morrisseyesque. But there comes a time in everyman's life when he must face the music and admit to what he is.

I'm old-fashioned when it comes to girls and romance.

Cutter
GARCIA

So there it is, my own personal dirty laundry aired out before you all. I'm a romantic, sue me.

Now I fully understand what I'm up against here. The brooding, misdirected, bountifully confused and extremely militant minority of the feminist cause will berate me soundly for my use of the word girls. They will say I'm the product of my father's demon seed and that I'm helping to reaffirm the long-established rites of tyranny and domination over women. And you know what I say to them?

Shut up, you're giving me a headache. Go take over a building and let me get back to my column. Thanks.

When I was a kid my grandfather Ray and I used to take walks together where he'd feed me little tidbits of information on how to succeed in life. And when the time finally came when I might start having an interest in girls, Ray gave me an earful.

He'd say things like, "1. Always make sure you have enough money in your wallet before you go out on a date. 2. Hold doors open for girls. 3. Be sure to walk on the curb side when sharing a sidewalk so she doesn't get hit with mud from passing cars. 4. Make sure you walk them to their door at the end of the evening and don't leave until you've seen them get safely inside. 5. Make certain to go out of your way to ensure that it's the best time she's ever had in her life, because if you don't, some other fella is going to. And most importantly, always be a gentleman — because there's pride in that and a lady will appreciate it."

And as we walked I guess I absorbed a lot of what Ray said because as I got older and had the opportunities to use these customs, I did. And they felt right. So right that I'm still using them today and have grown quite fond of them.

I like holding doors open. I always walk on the curb side. I never leave until she's safely inside. And I try to make damned well sure it's the most unique evening she's ever had — because I hate those "other fellas" who might beat me to it if I don't. Some might argue that these ancient customs only serve to rob women of their independence. A woman is capable of opening her own doors, walking herself home and paying her own way. And I totally agree that women can do all of these things and more.

In fact, I'm in total support of women asking men out on dates and instigating the rituals; God knows it would take a lot of pressure off us. But until they do I don't see any harm in keeping the dance the same. To tell you the truth, I don't think women are that opposed to the idea either.

One of the biggest complaints from females today, concerning personal relationships, is that the romance is gone or swiftly dying. During these days of self-absorbance and selfishness, a small thing like holding a door open takes on a whole new meaning.

We are all looking for that special someone to appear and make our lives complete. Someone who has the power to make our hearts flutter when they're near or bring a smile to our face when we're thinking of them. Somebody we desire to share everything with and couldn't imagine being without. If I have to live the rest of my life being labelled "old-fashioned" in order to find something like that, then fine. Stitch together the letters 'O.F.' and prynne them to my chest. It seems like a small price to pay.

We shouldn't be in such a rush to abolish all of the customs our society has created. Sometimes we concentrate so much on the negative aspects of our evolvement we forget the positive ones which worked and got us there.

Who knows? Maybe Ray was just a crazy old man who really didn't know anything about life. And maybe everything he told me about romance was wrong. I'll have to ask my grandmother Anne how she feels about it in October, because that's when she and Ray will be celebrating their 49th wedding anniversary.

Misinterpretation creates evils

I would like to thank Diana D'Avanzo [Collegian, April 5] for her enlightening interpretation of scripture.

I have always found the interpretation of the Bible a fascinating subject, particularly when it has been used to condemn and vilify members of society. Ms. D'Avanzo aptly demonstrates how previous generations' understanding can be harmful to people and larger evil can result.

I feel this reasoning may be equally applied to the passages often cited to condemn homosexuality. How have the phrasing and definitions changed over the centuries of translation and dozens of revisions?

The word "homosexual" does not appear in English until the 1800s. Is Leviticus 18:22, "Thou shalt not lie with mankind as with womankind: it is an abomination," an admonishment for men not to be passive and submissive with their lovers? Could it have come out of the pressing cultural need to rapidly increase population?

Jesus does not preach against people of the same gender loving each other in any of the Gospels. Besides, Jesus liked to hang out with prostitutes and apparently had some sort of a hair/foot fetish — and why was John his "favorite" apostle?

Again, I would like to thank Diana D'Avanzo for helping me realize that centuries of sexist and homophobic Biblical misinterpretation have created evils far greater than the sins they would condemn.

Old sexism myths refuse to die

Diana D'Avanzo's column [Collegian, April 5] brought home to me how hard it is for the old sexism myths which control our lives to die. The Bible honors women about as much as the university bureaucrat lives a free life or that UMass is a healthy and beautiful architectural environment to be surrounded by.

Diana needs to realize that in the Biblical scriptures there are not prophetesses who equal in authority Moses or Jesus.

In the official Bible, men are the official law makers and chief teachers. Wise women are almost unknown in the Biblical tales of rape, war, murder and incest. Christ himself was not conceived in love, but was artificially inseminated by Mary's faith in God the Father.

It would do Diana a world of good to hear feminist theologian Mary Daly speak this "Good Friday" evening at the Student Union Ballroom.

Greeks aren't alcohol-obsessed

I read the article on Ed Korza, director of Greek Affairs [Collegian, April 2] several times, and still could not believe what I was reading.

Mr. Korza seems to think there is an extreme problem with alcohol consumption among Greeks. The Greek Area is composed of a variety of individuals who, like myself, totally resent the fact that he has labeled the entire area as "obsessed with alcohol," because some of us choose not to drink and many of those who do choose to consume alcohol are extremely responsible.

Apparently, not being a Greek himself, Mr. Korza does not know first-hand what the Greek Area does stand for. Let me point out many of the reasons we are all members of fraternities and sororities: leadership, philanthropy, scholastics, community service, opportunity and friendship. (Notice: alcohol obsession was not on the list.)

It totally amazes me that the director of Greek Affairs could neglect many of these qualities but instead say, "The only way to improve the attitude toward the Greek Area is to keep their name out of the paper for 20 years — a whole generation."

Mr. Korza, let me give you a helpful hint: a good way to start changing people's views is to have those who "work so closely" with the Greek Area to stand up and support us instead of feeding the public the same stereotypes they already so wrongly associate with Greek life.

Court strikes down new bail law

Weld to refile the bill, which he says is constitutional

By EVE EPSTEIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — The state's highest court struck down newly-created changes to the state's bail laws Monday that allowed judges to weigh a defendant's danger to society, saying they violate the U.S. Constitution.

Gov. William Weld, who has pushed for the changes, said he will refile bail legislation he believes will meet the constitutional test.

Prior to the changes, initiated by Weld and signed into law last year, judges were only allowed to consider whether a defendant was likely to flee when setting bail.

The ruling stemmed from a 1992 case where Boston police found crack cocaine and about $44,350 in cash in an apartment as they arrested Carlito Aime.

The prosecutor recommended setting bail at $10,000. Aime's attorney recommended $200.

But Darrell Outlaw, the judge presiding in the Dorchester District Court case, rejected both proposals, citing 1992 changes to the state's bail statute signed into law the day before, which allowed judges to determine whether a person's release would pose a danger to the safety of others.

The district court judge said Aime was a drug dealer, and that "with this new bail statute, it's for keeping the people like this individual in court."

The judge set bail at $100,000 cash or $1 million surety. A single justice of the Supreme Judicial Court later reduced Aime's bail to $10,000.

Aime's defense team argued that the changes in the bail laws violated the due process clause of the 14th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, because they did not require prosecutors to prove the dangerousness of a defendant in determining whether a person should be held before trial.

The Supreme Judicial Court agreed, saying the amendments approved by the Legislature and signed into law by Weld infringe on an individual's right to be free from government detention.

"Historic liberties...include, if anything the right to be free from unjustified governmental intrusion on physical liberty," the court said in its unanimous ruling.

The court also noted that a federal Bail Reform Act enacted by Congress in 1984 included safeguards so the changes would only apply to a narrow set of situations. The U.S. Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the federal bail changes.

The federal act requires that the government convince a neutral decision maker by "clear and convincing evidence" that no conditions of release can assure the safety of the community.

But the Supreme Judicial Court said the state's bail reform act did not meet a similar test, and that it was too broad.

"The Bail Reform Act applies only to individuals who have been arrested for a specific category of serious offenses," the court said. "In contrast, the amendments to the state bail law apply to any arrestee."

Weld said Monday that if the legislation had been approved as he submitted it, the measure would have met the constitutional test because it allowed for a hearing to determine dangerousness.

Weld added he would refile legislation, possibly as soon as Tuesday, that would "fly under the standards announced by the SJC."

Senate President William Bulger said he was not surprised at the court's decision. "There is a presumption of innocence in the land, and there's a question of just exactly what we can do," he said.

Remembering the night James Brown saved Boston

By ROBERT W. TROTTS
Associated Press

BOSTON — It is still remembered as the night Boston was saved by Soul Brother #1, the Hardest Working Man in Show Business — Mr. James Brown.

Twenty-five years ago, the night after Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. was murdered in Memphis, Boston officials urged the Godfather of Soul to perform on television.

Perhaps teen-agers would stay home and watch instead of taking their anger and frustration to the streets.

Brown agreed, Boston stayed quiet.

"It was very, very hard," Brown said in a phone interview. "You'd lost one of the family, a man that stood for good, a man that was fighting evil."

"It was a decision to have the concert because it allowed people to sort of let off some steam but yet mourn at the same time," said community activist Sarah-Ann Shaw.

"James Brown, of course, was a person who was speaking to young people in those days," she said.

Meanwhile, other cities - Chicago, New York, Baltimore, Detroit, Denver, Memphis, San Francisco, Pittsburgh - burst into riot.

Washington, D.C. suffered the most. In four days of rioting, more than 1,200 homes and businesses were burned, with damages estimated at $24.7 million. More than 7,600 people were arrested, 12 people died, and 1,200 were treated for injuries; more than 11,500 federal troops were called in.

In Boston, violence on the night of the shooting was limited to a few broken windows and stoned cars.

City Hall and community leaders were worried, though, that the uneasy peace would collapse.

On April 5, about 5,000 people marched in tribute from Boston Common to Post Office Square in King's memory. At City Hall, a black city councilor, Thomas Atkins, convinced Mayor Kevin H. White to let Brown's concert at Boston Garden proceed as scheduled.

"I wanted to cancel it," said White, who had been in office for only a few weeks, "But the idea of it going on television, having it covered and giving a lot of people the opportunity to see it at home and not go out, seemed to be an opportunity worth gambling on."

"He realized that I had a lot of influence with the kids, that they listened to me," Brown said.

White asked public television station WGBH to broadcast Brown's concert after urging the city's youth to stay home.

The 2 1/2 hour show was a typical, rousing performance. He ran through his hits - "Try Me," "I Got a Feeling," and a cover of "Kansas City" that segued in to "Ain't That a Groove."

"Everybody was happy," Brown recalled, "Kids were up on stage and they wanted to get into it, so I let some of them dance and I made then sit back down."

In actuality, there was only about 2,000 people who came to the sold-out show. But, the cameras only showed the dancing crowd on the floor in front of the stage.

A look at the real truth behind the ignorance

Kristin J.
ST. JOHN

Well, here we go again. It's amazing but, there are actually still people out there that harbor many stereotypical, insulting and just plain misinformation about the minority population in this country.

This past weekend, I took the time to think about what was thrown my way from the conservative stuff-shirts. At first I was extremely angry and was ready to roll. But, then I realized that it's that small sad population that lives in their own little world that ultimately suffers; not the rest of us who are well-informed and open-minded.

Those wonderful people are now believing that if we encourage minority enrollment at UMass, thus the value of our hard earned diploma will go down. How ridiculous. Is that supposed to mean that minorities are basically not worthy to go to college? That historically black colleges aren't worth their accreditation?

I think not.

I believe that the reason there aren't more minorities on this college campus lately could result in many other reasons, not because we aren't "worthy" to grace our presence on UMass.

Have people realized that as far as recruitment, minorities aren't really reached by many colleges? In my high school, I was encouraged to go to UMass-Dartmouth because that "was where all the black people are." No one thought to tell me that UMass-Amherst was even an option. If it wasn't for Nicholas McBride writing me and sending information about Committee Collegiate Education of Black and other Minority Students and other programs, I may have gone to Dartmouth or just some place else.

What our administration has to realize is that this state system is losing capable minority high school students to the private colleges who are smart enough to give these students the right financial aid. Many of my friends who are still in high school are getting schmoozed by private schools from all around the country. They have yet to get anything from UMass. It's like these talented kids just don't exist.

Also, how are these people going to explain why historically black colleges have survived all these years? Do they know how hard it is to get into Howard, Morehouse or even Spelman?

I know many students who tried to get into these colleges but couldn't get past the strict requirements. But, these students did get into state universities — these great white places of academia.

And whoever said that if minority recruitment into UMass would make it a dangerous place to go should check their crime statistics. Yes, we look at the Tara Hartnett and Alex Delgado incidents, and they did not need to happen at all. But, who's to say that every single minority student is going to come here and committ violent crimes. To think about it, the people involved, except for Hartnett, weren't even students.

After the Washington Tower incident no one said all the white males on this campus were racists and decided that if we let more in our diploma is going to sink. What I'm trying to say is that incidents like that are isolated acts that, unfortunately, are twisted and used by those who are ignorant.

Basically, when people are suggesting that we need to get minority enrollment up, that doesn't mean our precious UMass is going to go down the tubes. It means that our University is going to offer some really talented students an opportunity to excel at a state university. By, making this a priority our campus could possibly be on its way into a new future of more understanding.

That is, if those stuffed shirts don't get into the way.

The meeting had been billed as a key attempt to open besieged cities and get U.N. peacekeepers into Srebrenica.

Lt. Gen. Lars-Eric Wahlgren, commander of the U.N. peacekeepers, said the only outcome was that all sides promised to keep a shaky 10-day-old cease-fire in place as long as they are not fired upon.

In Sarajevo, the truce did nothing to save the life of Igor Bojo, a 19-year-old Bosnian soldier felled by a sniper's bullet on a clear spring day.

"Tell me he's not dead. Please tell me he's alive," Igor's mother wailed after identifying her son's body at the morgue.

Fighting began last April 6 when Serb gunmen opened fire on demonstrators and the European Community recognized Bosnia's independence from Yugoslavia.

Bosnian Serbs rebelled, and now hold 70 percent of Bosnia-Herzogovina. More than 134,000 people are dead or missing. Two million have been driven from their homes.

In the Serb and Yugoslav capital of Belgrade, Milosevic reiterated his support for Bosnia's Serbs.

"Sanctions and efforts to isolate Serbia cannot contribute to the solution of the problem," Milosevic said.

In an interview in Tuesday's Washington Post, Milosevic predicted that Washington would avoid employing forceful measures against the Serbs in Bosnia.

President Clinton dismissed the comments as "pure politics."

The U.N. Security Council has begun discussions of tougher sanctions against the remaining Yugoslav republics of Serbia and Montenegro, which have weathered an international trade embargo imposed last May 30 for fomenting war in Bosnia.

"[The office] will strengthen our interactions with the metropolitan area," O'Brien said.

"By having a base in the region's business center, the University believes it will be better able to serve the area's companies and so help spur the region's economy."

Demaki agreed with O'Brien that the office's location will aid the University's effort to interact more directly with the region's business headquarters.

"The location is very important," he said. "The Chamber of Commerce has given us an office right next to the Springfield Economic Corporation, the Massport office and the Hampden County Private Industry Council. [The office] gives us a very efficient way of learning about the economic needs of the Springfield area."

The office is being funded by the Springfield Chamber of Commerce and the Western Massachusetts Electric Company. The University formed a partnership with the Western Massachusetts Electric Company last fall in an effort to encourage economic development in the Western Massachusetts region.

Acapella voices highlight of GLB cafe

Carrie Ferguson, MHC's 'Nice Shoes' win over audience at Hampden Theatre

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

GLB Cafe
Hampden Theatre
April 3, 1993

The seamlessly entertaining GLB Cafes have proven throughout this year that they are one of the Valley's best-kept secrets. Part coffeehouse, comedy club and intimate concert setting, the versatile performers and artists come together to celebrate just being themselves.

Saturday evening's cafe was, for the most part, no exception to this almost foolproof formula. A ponderously dull opening act almost marred the evening, but the cafe recovered with two stellar, blissfully entertaining acts.

Life, the Universe and Everything: A Fairytale (for lesbians, too) and Anyone Else Who Likes to Be Themselves, a performance art piece by Chris Macek, has a confusing title that is matched only by the utter pointlessness of its existence. This is the kind of out-there act that is giving 'performance art' a bad name.

Candles were placed on the four corners of the stage and it was announced that we were going to "summon a wizard." We did indeed — or at least some guy wailing off stage to the sounds of a wildlife tape. As Prospero, some kind of wizard-type guy, Macek roared on stage like the last train from Pretentiousville.

As he rambled on about a variety of seemingly disconnected subjects, from identity to the crucifixion, Macek looked as though he was making it up as he was going along. Interspersing leftover pseudo-Shakespeare with anachronisms like "okay," Macek reminded me of Richard Dreyfuss and his woefully pathetic Richard III in Neil Simon's The Goodbye Girl. The big difference is that Dreyfuss was playing it for laughs. Unfortunately for all concerned, Macek wasn't.

Much, much better was a capella soloist Carrie Ferguson. Singing what she described as "walking songs," Ferguson lit up the stage with her crisp, full voice, alternating down-home twang and full-bodied choruses.

Singing about her life in California, friends and a decidedly tongue-in-cheek ditty called "I Go Naked," Ferguson was simply charming. It's too easy to say that she is an intriguing mixture of k.d. lang and Tracy Chapman, because Ferguson is a true original. Someone sign her — quickly!

The Mt. Holyoke College feminist a capella Group Nice Shoes opened their lively, entertaining set of empowering tunes with "I'm Coming Out." This GLB cafe was their first off-campus appearance, and by the looks of it, it will be far from their last.

Obviously having a great time — their spirit was definitely catchy — Nice Shoes alternated songs and a few scattershot comedy routines. A cover of the Annie Lennox-Aretha Franklin "Sisters (Are Doing It For Themselves)" was shaky and remarkably soul-less, but I'll chock it up to opening jitters.

Carly Simon's "Let the River Run" from the film Working Girl was next, and Nice Shoes proved that intricate harmonies are their strongest points. It was followed up by their best song, the Flirtations standard "Everything is Possible" led by a show-stopping solo by Anne DeAcetis.

The best thing about Nice Shoes is they know how to play to their audience. When the women tried to get into position and ended up all going in different ones, sharp-witted director Wendy Woodward quipped, "We sing — we don't walk."

Nice Shoes closed their set with a hilarious cover of the Two Nice Girls' cult fave "Spent My Last $10 on Birth Control and Beer" that playfully toyed with sexuality without being overly silly or reactionary and a haunting, stunningly beautiful version of The Beatles' "Something." You've got to see it to believe it.

The evening proved itself more than worthy, even with Macek's dreary monologue. Both Carrie Ferguson and Nice Shoes deserve showcases of their own, and just by Saturday evening's performances, I'm sure their bright futures aren't that far off.

Travolta tries to dance on HSCN this week

By EDWARD W. HUMPHRIES
Collegian Staff

Fresh from the star-studded hysterics of last week's grand slam salute to the Hollywood elite at the 64th annual Academy Awards, HCN serves up a slew of films brimming with former Oscar contenders. This week on HSCN, Gene Hackman reprises his Oscar-winning role as hard-boiled police detective Popeye Doyle in the 70s crime drama The French Connection II while Mercedes Ruehl plays failed shock jock Jeff Bridges' long-suffering girlfriend in the film that earned her a Best Supporting Actress trophy, The Fisher King.

Though these films have all received considerable air time on HSCN in the past two months, it's worth giving some a second look and discovering some of the more obscure titles like this week's magical Cinema Paradiso. And have heart, for an entirely new playlist of films should arrive at the end of April.

Silver Streak — Following their moderately funny prison comedy Stir Crazy, Gene Wilder and Richard Pryor appeared headed on the fast track toward successful team comedies, a la Hope and Crosby, but this comic ode to Hitchcock suspense films set aboard a runaway train quickly derails any such comic genius. The problem is this film walks a tightrope, trying desperately to blend comedy and suspense genres, and in doing so hampers both efforts. The thrills attempt to mock Hitchcockian themes borrowing from the master's Strangers on a Train but they fail to achieve any suspense and the forced tension restrains both Wilder and Pryor from letting loose and steering this flop away from disaster on the rails. C-

Staying Alive — Director Sylvestor Stallone tried to revive the disco phenomena in the mid-80s with this sequel to John Badham's 70s hit Saturday Night Fever by reuniting audiences with former Barbarino, John Travolta, but based on box office returns, audiences had had "the last dance." Perhaps this film's failure lies in the fact that introducing a disco flick in the breakdancing era was true cinematic suicide. Stallone's focus is lost (somewhere in the woods with Johnny Rambo) and the love story between Travolta and newcomer Cynthia Gibb is tepid and just plain boring. In this time of Techno and RAVE, this film plays even worse. D

John Travolta stars in "Staying Alive" on HSCN.

Avalon — Director Barry Levinson continues his semi-autobiographical trilogy of life in hometwon Baltimore, begun in 1981's Diner and continued in 1987's Tin Men, in this affecting portrait of a young immigrant's arrival in America and the subsequent generations of family he bears. Levinson, clearly modeling these characters on his own relatives, creates a melodramatic but very enchanting look at family ties and the American Dream. Armin Muehl-Stahler (Music Box) truly captures the role of the hard-working immigrant patriarch and the supporting cast headlining Aidan Quinn is also very good. It's worth viewing this visually rich cinematic family album. B+

Cocoon — One of the better E.T. ripoffs of the mid-80s, this film centers on the arrival of benevolent aliens to Ft. Lauderdale, Florida where they affect the lives of a group of elderly folk who had previously lost lust for life. Ron Howard tries desperately to awe his audience, call it Spielberg-Lite, and for the most part succeeds thanks to lively performances by a casting coup of Hollywood legends including Don Ameche, Hume Cronyn, Jessica Tandy and Quaker Oatmeal huckster Wilford Brimley. Spectacular Industrial Light and Magic effects dominate the film's second half but fortunately do not upstage the fine performances by Hollywood's heyday actors. Brian Dennehy and Steve Guttenberg round out the superb cast. B+

The Emerald Forest — Powers Booth plays a father who returns to the Brazillian rain forest to relocate his son who was kidnapped by an indigenous tribe years before in director John Boorman's melodramatic portrayal of redemption. Boorman focuses on the father's psyche which has suffered years of torment at the hands of guilt and has reduced Booth's character to a hollow soul determined to recover his son. When he discovers that his son has become integrated within the tribe, his true pain comes to being. Boorman's story of the love between father and son is compelling and the cinematography of the jungle, similar to Boorman's handling of the forests in Deliverance, is at once very beautiful and eerily haunting. B

The Great Gatsby — Robert Redford is in peak performance in this adaptation of the F. Scott Fitzgerald Jazz Era classic focusing on the trials and tribulations of the wealthy upper-class denizens of Long Island. Redford plays the title role, an eccentric millionaire who's presence greatly unnerves the families around him whom are usually so guarded in their wealth. Displaying the breakdown of the bourgeois society of the 20s and the increased arrival of dysfunctional households, this film reveals themes that aren't quite abandoned in this day. Bruce Dern gives a good performance as the patriarch of his family struggling to maintain a grasp on the two things he has ever held sacred, his money and his wife. A-

Cop Shoot Cop arrests crowd

Cop Shoot Cop
Pearl Street
April 2, 1993

On Friday night at Pearl Street, Cop Shoot Cop produced a performance of energy and aggression which showed that there is still something going on out there after all.

Adherents of Techno, particularly on the other side of the Atlantic, have recently become rather fond of gleefully proclaiming the death of rock in the face of more progressive and experimintal movements in dance music. While this may be a bit premature, it certainly seems that rock's options are running out with more and more new bands simply retreading ground that has been gone over many times before. Dieselmeat and Rodan, the supporting acts on Friday, were good exapmles of this — playing their trade at the ugly thrash end of the generic grunge scale. They made a good noise, but nothing that thousands of other bands aren't also currently doing.

The most interesting bands of the moment are those that are trying to find a way out of rock's impasse, either by reinterpreting its lost origins in the blues (P.J. Harvey, Come), or untethering themselves from it completely and heading off into the stratosphere (Mercury Rev, Bark Psychosis). A third tactic, that which Cop Shoot Cop opt for, is to confront dance music's challenge head-on and reinvent rock. To date, however, this is a project which has mostly been the province of smug charlatans like Jesus Jones, who talk the right talk but fail dismally to come up with the product to match it.

In live performance, Cop Shoot Cop's unconventional set-up proved that they have genuinely found some fresh possibilities. Where the eighties noise avant-garde deconstructed rock and reduced it to fragments, Cop Shoot Cop took those fragments and reassembled them into something new — something big and vicious and

Listen to This: alternatives to popular grunge

By KEN MAIURI
Collegian Staff

Are you sick of hearing "Detachable Penis" for the tenth time? Does grunge make you cringe? Are you looking for something new, truly out of the mainstream? Something MTV ignores so they can force-feed the world more "Buzz Clips?" If so, then listen to this:

1985-1991
Sneetches
Alias Records

So you've never heard of the Sneetches: join the club. Named after a Dr. Seuss book, the Sneetches are four California guys who play damn-catchy pop songs that are hard to pigeonhole stylistically, though they're reminiscent of the Zombies and the Partridge Family.

1985-1991 is a compilation of early demos, EPs and outtakes from their albums, as well as four new songs. There are highlights aplenty (the chugging "He's Frank," the spooky "Daisy" and the hilarious "In My Car") and more surprises hiding between the near-perfect songs. Be the first on your block to love the Sneetches! And then tell your friends what they're missing. A

It's Low Beat Time!
Young Fresh Fellows Frontier Records

These guys were from Seattle long before it was cool. Though not nearly as goofy as they were when they started in 1985, YFF have plugged away, releasing an album a year of tuneful, humorous "college rock." Their last time out (Electric Bird Digest) was a tired, rushed affair, but thankfully the Fellows have pulled themselves together to make one of their catchiest discs yet.

"Mr. Anthony's Last," "Whatever You Are," and "A Minor Bird" are great, and "Green Green" features vocals from 75-year-old blues legend Rufus Thomas over a grungy slab of guitars. The album's instrumental rave-up "Low Beat" is stiff compared to past efforts, but it's good to see the guys still around and unknown. B+

Human Radio
Human Radio
Columbia

Too lyrically quirky to be mainstream, too musically smooth to be of any interest to the average 120 Minutes viewer (especially in this Age of Nirvana), Human Radio is truly alternative. Influenced by everyone from Frank Zappa to Fishbone to XTC to Stevie Wonder, these four guys play super-melodic pop/rock with tons of hooks and interesting shifts and breaks.

"Hole in My Head" is a Beatlesque gem, "Harsh Light of Reality" is a violin-propelled Arabic pop song with a beautiful chorus, and "Me and Elvis" is a should-have-been hit with lines like "Me and Elvis never worried about the cops/he flashed that badge he got from Nixon every time that we got stopped." Great album. A

Escape From Noise
Negativland
SST Records

This album is a 42-minute soundscape of noises strange and funny, arranged into "accessible suggested cuts" that range from one to five minutes. The noises include Jerry Garcia and Bob Weir arguing, a guy from Devo flushing a toilet, housewives talking about guns, and a little girl with hiccups singing "Over the Rainbow." What the hell is this, you may ask?

Well, Negativland is four guys from California — one is a day care worker, one writes computer programs, etc. They aren't musicians, and Escape From Noise has no real songs (with one exception) but there are shards of melody, synthesizer riffs and drum machines creeping in and out of the mix. "Yellow Black and Rectangular," "Car Bomb," and "The Playboy Channel" are highlights, not to mention unexplainable. Weird and wonderful—try it out. A

Campus Man on Spring

Your eyes open slowly like a newborns. Birds chirp as they sit helplessly on your window sill. You then crunch up your pillow as your eyes slowly focus in on those glowing green digital numbers from your "Dream Machine" alarm clock. The time is 6:54 a.m. However, your body is telling you that it is 5:54 a.m., but in reality, daylight savings is in effect and you come to grips with the fact that it is six minutes to seven.

Moments later you find yourself rinsing away that morning breath just as you tighten them laces to your running shoes. You do a few stretches. Live from Amherst is Wednesday's Campus Man column...

Adam Scott
ROBERTS

Aside from that, it's (title up) SPRING!!! Welcome to UMass after the thaw and the mud hardening. The green from Haigis Mall is shadowed by the white morning dew. Seldom cars pass you along Massachusetts Avenue as you realize it's time to put away the sweats and pull out the shorts. Spring time is the time where more and more people will be getting outside and doing active things such as walking, running, rollerblading, and bicycling all in addition to that pre-summer (yes, the D-word) diet.

Breathe that valley fresh air. Feed the duckies at our Campus Pond. Admire the Berkshire Range that nestles around the Tower library in that cloudless sky.

Spring marks the beginning on may things — a new solstice, warmth (the other pre-season to that ever-so-shvitzing heat), and finally that most annoying voice saying "The section that you have requested is overenrolled. Please enter a two digit action code." I can't stand that two digit action code shabang.

Ah yes, registration, a mind boggling activity that springs (no pun intended?) on us Minutemen folk is officially here. Insert that creepy "Twilight Zone" music now!

Course catalogs will soon be flooding the 2nd floor lobby of Whitmore the same way winter's snow blankets the campus.

UMass may be a tad large but you love it here in liberaland right? Either that or you're planning on transferring? Well, if your not one of those transfer-to-be students (or even if you are) and you would like to continue the joys of UMassteria but want the feel for a smaller college and you are in need of a new scene then explore the valley. Take 5-College classes at any of our private school counterparts: Amherst, Smith (Smithie), Hampshire (Camp Hamp), or Mt. Holyoke (Mt. H).

The 5-College Consortium is the oldest and best of it's kind in the nation. You'll earn extra credits (you gotta love that) and you'll be allowed to explore beyond the UMassteria for free (you definitely gotta love that)!

This program is one of the best opportunities available to UMass students. Hey, where else can you go to an elite private college and sit and learn with student's paying double as much tuition as yourself and get their high-quality private school, small classes, top-notch education?

The 5-College Program offers a chance to go outside the largeness of UMass. At any of the other small schools you won't be just another number and you'll meet all new people (and new gossip!).

You see, not only can you go to this large institution but you can also get the personal attention at a smaller school at the same time. Transportation is convenient and very, very cheap (free!). Ride that PVTA!

Remember when opportunity knocks — by all means answer. Life is all about opportunities and taking advantage of them and learning to better enhance your personal growth.

So, while your busy exercising, shedding your clothes, catching some rays, plan to break out of your shell and explore. It will make that UMassteria a whole lot better.

Ralph Bakshi's rip-off of Who Framed Roger Rabbit faded quickly from theaters last summer and for good reason. its a dreadfully unfunny mix of live action and poor animation, further drained by devastatingly bad performances by Gabriel Byrne and Kim Basinger as the reanimated cartoon Holli Would. The plot is a muddled mess centered around Holli Would's quest to be real and free from the animated dimension Cool World, which can only be fulfilled through consummating her passions with a member of the real world, Gabrile Byrne. Sound ridiculous? It is! The ads for this film screamed "Holli Would If She Could!" As for viewing this movie, Don't!! F

The Adventures of Baron Munchausen — This cinematic tall tale from the hands of Monthy Python alum Terry Gilliam is an ingeniously original and visually appealing film. The story concerns itself with the fantastic adventures of the boastful title character as he travels from the belly of a sea monster to the craters of the moon in search of a host of past acquaintances to help aid his kingdom in a battle against an invading army of Turks. Although the story is slightly convoluted, this small problem is alleviated by inventive special effects and a cast of cameos including Uma Thurman, Eric Idle and a manic Robin Williams as the King of the Moon. A-

Also playing this week but not reviewed are To Catch a Thief, Judgement in Berlin, Alien 3, Beverly Hills Cop, Big Girls Don't Cry, Die Hard and Extremities.

Camper Vantiquities
Camper Van Beethoven
I.R.S. Records

Rip off! Capitalizing on their breakup, I.R.S. has reissued the first three Camper Van Beethoven CDs. Whereas the original third CD (on Pitch-a-Tent) included the EP Vampire Can Mating Oven, I.R.S. has deemed it necessary to make a separate CD of the six tracks along with ten unreleased things and call it a "rarities" disc.

Of the ten "new" songs, only one is of any interest ("Axe Murderer Song," which shows hints of the old Camper wit). Otherwise, there are three unimpressive covers, a mediocre song ("Crossing Over") and five instrumentals that take a long time to go nowhere. Meanwhile there are real rarities like the hilarious "Lincoln Shrine" and the AOR remix of "I Was Born In a Laundromat" that are still impossible to get. If you don't own Vampire Can, B+. If you do, D- thirsty for blood.

This brings us to the other interesting attribute of the band — they actually manage to bring politics into their music without sounding like crap. The problem with most political rock these days is that it couches its wish for a better world in the musical context of gooey liberal niceness, lacking any real intensity and so generally leaving an impression of bland worthiness.

Cop Shoot Cop take their cue from Public Enemy, about the only really decent political band of the last decade, in realizing that political anger is most forceful when combined with musical anger. Their performance at Pearl Street made it very clear that Cop Shoot Cop aren't a band who sit you down and have a polite conversation with you, they're a band who scream in your face until you realize they mean it.

On stage they were a powerful unit and you could feel a tangible sense of their pent-up energy from the audience. Their twin bass attack was backed up with the innovative use of samplers and an impressive array of metal objects which virtually encased the percussionist in his own instruments. These were used to good effect in combination with raucous trumpet on the heavily rhythmic "$10 Bill," off the new album.

As well as showcasing Ask Questions Later, the band also played old favorites like like "Burn Your Bridges" and "Shine on Elizabeth," which caused delight down in front and produced some very entertainng violence in the moshpit. Their set was a bit short, ending just when I was really getting my head into it, but it had full impact — a great performance from a potent live band.

Naked Boston man makes point

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — A Boston man stripped outside a University of Pennsylvania building Thursday to demonstrate his belief in public nudity as a constitutional right.

After a short speech espousing his rights, first-year law student Shalom Nachman stripped to a bandana around his waist as a crowd watched.

"In this country, as long as you're wearing a G-string, you're OK. Because I feel comfortable being nude, I am now going to remove the bandana," he said.

Afterward, Nachman, 26, went to class wearing the bandana over his private parts.

He said state laws banning public nudity should be rewritten to exclude bans on "people like myself who view nudity in a positive way."

Nachman said his actions were sparked by a discussion in his constitutional law class on a 1991 Supreme Court decision that prohibits individual states from legalizing public nudity.

The Boston native had originally planned to attend class in the nude.

"My professor told me that I needed the consent of the entire class first," Nachman said. "Two percent of the students were opposed."

Associate law professor Seth Kreimer said he praised his student's convictions.

"It's not something I would have done," Kreimer said.

Last year the University of California rewrote its dress code, requiring clothes and expelled student Andrew Martinez after he insisted on strutting naked.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Come to grips with an important creative project early in the day. Influential people are in your corner. Be prepared to take on new family responsibilities.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Career matters bring both new financial rewards and a lot of personal satisfaction. Keep up with new developments. Take care to clean your home before relatives arrive for a visit.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): An excellent day to focus on long-range goals. Discuss finances with your partner and set a deadline for saving a certain amount of money. Be a good friend to a neighbor.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Extra career or family obligations are featured today. Higher-ups appraise your performance; you pass with flying colors! Separate fantasy from fact when setting goals.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Today you will be seen as a rising star — or luckily find extra money in the cookie jar. In public places, you win people over with your social graces. Postpone making crucial decisions.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): You have a knack for saying and doing the right thing! Nothing ventured, nothing gained. Roll the dice in romance — someone close by may be waiting for a chance. Be open-minded.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): A private or backstage meeting leads to a valuable exchange and makes a grand impression on influential people. Take a sibling home with you and pay any outstanding debts.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): You may have to say or do something difficult today. Humor makes it easier! Having a partner by your side will make a big difference in sticking to your diet-exercise resolutions.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): You may not be sure what to do next. Talk to creative thinkers, especially those who care deeply about your future. Understanding an employer's unspoken desires is the key to success.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Your friendships are especially rewarding now. You can win the assistance you desire simply by asking. Maintain a loving heart if domestic challenges arise.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): The pace accelerates at both work and home. Take a practical approach to getting things done with ease. Speak gently to those who question your methods — all resistance will melt away.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): A day to proceed carefully, not feverishly. Trim expenses and reduce your debts. Love places its own demands on your time.

Rangers and Isles clash, NHL awards prediction

It has become the battle of the Empire State for the final playoff spot in the Patrick division. This battle features the young and talented New York Islanders, and the underachieving New York Rangers.

Perhaps underachieving is an understatement. The Rangers need the Heimlich manuever because this team is choking badly. Last week, the Islanders won an important head-to-head battle to move into fourth place.

After the Canadians bested the Islanders, the Rangers blew a chance to retake fourth by losing to the lowly Whalers Monday night. Mark Messier promised to lead the Rangers to the Stanley Cup. There's always next year Mark.

Matt
VAUTOUR

With only three points separating the first-place Canadians and the third place Nordiques, home ice advantage in the Adams division is far from decided. The upcoming home-and-home series between the Bruins and Nordiques will go a long way in determining the winner.

With the 1992-93 regular season a week away from over, now is a good time to speculate on the winners of this year's post-season awards.

Hart Trophy (MVP): Mario Lemieux, Pittsburgh. In any other year this award goes to Toronto's Doug Gilmour. He's brought a winning attitude, and the leadership that was so desperately needed in Toronto. The Leafs have leapfrogged past Chicago into second place. But in the 1992-93 campaign, nobody comes even close to Super Mario.

Despite missing twenty-four games, Lemieux still leads the NHL in scoring. During his absence, the Penguins were just an average team. With Mario Lemieux in the line up, the Penguins are the most dominant force in the NHL. During the 1992-93 season, Mario Lemieux was the definition of Most Valuable Player.

Art Ross Trophy (NHL's Leading Scorer): This award will come down to Lemieux (150 points) and Pat LaFontaine (143), with Lemieux pulling away. If Lemieux hadn't been sidelined during the season, he may have gone on to break Gretzky's all-time record for points in a season. Some sports enthusiasts say nobody dominates a game the way Michael Jordan does. They haven't been to Pittsburgh lately.

Vezina Trophy (NHL's top goalie): Felix Potvin, Toronto. In only his rookie season, the Maple Leaf netminder has been a wall between the posts, leading the NHL in goals against average.

Black Hawk goalie Ed Belfour will probably win the award, but his performance has been enhanced by Chicago's excellent defensive corps. Potvin has been superb and surprisingly consistent for a rookie, despite Toronto's inexperienced defense.

Norris Trophy (NHL's top defensemen): Chris Chelios, Chicago. The Black Hawks have allowed the fewest goals of any team in the NHL. A lot of the credit for this statistic has to go to the Chicago defense.

Since Chelios was acquired, the Black Hawk defense has risen to the top of the league. Chelios, who is having a career year has been the leader of this team on and off the ice. If it wasn't for the incredible year of Lemieux, Chelios would be a Hart Trophy contender.

Calder Trophy (Rookie of the Year): Teemu Selanne, Winnipeg. The pre-season hype all surrounded Eric Lindros, but Selanne has emerged to lock up the award. As only the eighth seventy-goal scorer in NHL history, Selanne will become the second straight European to be named the league's top rookie. Selanne has eclipsed all rookie scoring records, and it may not be long before Teemu skates off with the Hart Trophy as well.

NHL All-Stars 1992-1993

First Team
Center: Mario Lemieux, Pittsburgh
Wings: Teemu Selanne, Winnipeg, Alexander Mogilny, Buffalo
Defense: Chris Chelios Chicago, Phil Housley, Winnipeg
Goalie: Felix Potvin, Toronto

Second Team
Center Pat LaFontaine, Buffalo
Wings Mark Recchi, Philidelphia, Luc Robitaille, Los Angelas
Defense Steve Duchesne, Quebec, Raymond Bourque, Boston

Softball sweeps doubleheader from B.C.

By JASON NASH
Collegian Staff

After sweeping Monday's doubleheader over St. Bonaventure, the University of Massachusetts softball team picked up where they left off yesterday at Totman Field, sweeping Boston College, 9-3, 6-2, in their season home opener.

The Minutewomen (6-9 overall, 2-0 in the A-10), were led with great starting pitching and third inning rallies in both games to increase their win streak to four in a row. Remarkably, this was just their second day of "outdoor ball" in two weeks.

"I was very pleased with everyone's performance, considering we've been in a gymnasium for a while," said UMass Softball Head Coach Elaine Sortino. "It's tough to come out here, but we took it to them."

UMass was led by sophomore Kelly Daut (3-5) in game one. Daut gave up just two hits and two runs (none earned) over five innings work. While Daut impressed many with her performance, she said she felt that today's game was not her best.

"My arm felt good and it was great to be out there," Daut said. "I really think I didn't pitch all that well and I'm expecting better outings as the season goes on."

On the offensive side it was senior catcher Sherri Kuchinskas (3-for-4 with a double, a run scored and three runs batted in) and senior leftfielder Stacey Nichols (2-for-4 with a double, two runs scored and two RBI) who provided all the punch UMass would need.

The bottom of the third, saw Kuchinskas, Nichols and company break open for seven runs, led by five hits for a rally through the heart of the Minutewomen's order.

In Game Two senior hurler Darlene Claffey (3-4) turned in a stellar performance on the mound, grabbing a complete game, scattering seven hits, and collecting her 44th career win as a Minutewomen.

"I tell you, through the third and fourth innings Darlene kept saying 'I'm not comfortable out there,'" Sortino said. "Mentally, she did a great job recovering to get the victory."

Indeed, Claffey took a page out of a late-August Roger Clemens and just seemed to get stronger as the game went on, breezing through the sixth and seventh innings.

"Towards the end, I just started to get into the rhythm," Claffey said, "and I felt really strong by final out."

At the plate, Nicols continued her feast on opposing B.C. pitchers, finding her way to another 2-for-4 game, including three runs scored.

"She hit the life out of the ball," Sortino said. "And, you know, we needed that."

As always, after a spring full of precipitation, the opening day field condition is always a question.

"The grounds crew did a fabulous job," Sortino said. "The fields in perfect shape."

Up and down weekend, as lax wins and loses

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

HEMPSTEAD, N.Y. — Since the 60s, the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team has been known as the Gorillas. But two sets of Gorillas showed up at the Hofstra Spring Shootout: imposters in Gorilla suits who suffered a 16-8 upset loss to unrankeds Hofstra on Saturday, and real live animals who defeated Duke 12-11 on Sunday.

UMass, now 2-2, fell victim to a sluggish performance on Saturday against Hofstra, then regained their intensity to defeat the 11th-ranked Blue Devils. The win gave UMass coach Ted Garber his 100th career victory.

"We played with determination today, we played with pride today and we played as a team today. . .that wasn't there [vs. Hofstra]," said Garber, whose Gorillas fell from 10th to 15th in this week's United States Intercollegiaite Lacrosse poll.

The Gorillas trailed early in both games. But the added effort which, by the admission of coaches and players alike, was missing against Hofstra helped put UMass over the top on Sunday.

Bolstered by a five-goal performance from Mark Millon and clutch defense, UMass erased a 6-2 deficit to take a 9-7 lead and in the third quarter, holding Duke scoreless in the third. They then held off a Blue Devil comeback in the fourth quarter for the win - their first against a ranked opponent this year.

"After the Hofstra loss we didn't want to let ourselves down," said Millon, who collected his second five-goal game of the year. "If you're on a bad team and you lose you learn to accept it. But when you're on a good team you can never accept it."

The UMass turnaround began in the second, when Mike Valente (2 goals, three assists) and Millon heated up. The Gorillas scored two man-up goals and got two Millon scores, closing the gap to 7-6 at halftime.

The Gorillas picked up where they left off in the third quarter, outscoring Duke 3-0. Millon, Bill Edell and Matt Bailey all converted for UMass.

But the biggest reason for UMass' third quarter performance was the play of their defense and the play of goaltender Rip Correnti. The Gorillas, who were missing their defensive slides in the first half, adjusted their defense and played, as co-captain Jim Panetta put it, "with our sticks on their gloves."

The Blue Devils took an 11-10 lead in the fourth before Depp tied the game with a great move to the cage. But Bailey and Matt Triolo put UMass up for good on a textbook give-and-go and the UMass defense held through the final five minutes.

Chris Nentwich, who came up with a crucial poke check that thwarted Duke's last scoring chance with under a minute to go. Correnti also came up big in the clutch, making a game-saving stop on a shot with just over two minutes to go.

UMass was not as fortunate against the Flying Dutchmen of Hofstra. Again, the Gorillas were down early, but due to Hofstra's dominance of time of possession and aggressive, scrappy play, UMass could never get back into the game.

Tellingly, the Flying Dutchmen won 49 ground balls to UMass' 28 and dominated face-offs throughout. A six-goal run in the third quarter and 8 goals by attacker Dave Donatello wrapped up the win for Hofstra, who improved to 3-1.

Gorillas face PC Friars

Soggy conditions will make play difficult

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

The recent wet weather has left lacrosse fields a soggy mess and has played havoc on collegiate schedules throughout the New England area. The University of Massachusetts and Providence College are no exception.

But the teams will try to play through the mud today as the Minutemen travel to Providence, R.I. to take on the Friars at 3 p.m. Providence has already cancelled two home games because of poor playing conditions so UMass coach Ted Garber has his doubts about how the conditions have improved.

"A couple days ago, the field was under water," said Garber. "If it's not rolled by game time, it's going to be tough to play."

But Garber also thinks that regardless of playing conditions, his squad is indeed the better of the two teams and that if the Gorillas play tough defense, make crisp passes and hit all their shots, they should have no problem earning a victory.

"I think we're ready to play tomorrow," he said. "Tomorrow's game is a chance for us to get a lot of different combinations in there if we play disciplined and work hard.

"And of course, any time a team plays you tough in the last contest," Garber said, referring to last season's come-from-behind 11-9 UMass victory over P.C., "there's that incentive to go out and take it to these guys."

But first, the Gorillas will have to contend with the likes of leading scorer Bill Pymm, who has tallied five goals in the first two games. Also posing some potential problems could be team leader in points Dan Bianco (eight) and Stephen Kelley, who has seven points on the season.

"They're not a real finesse team," said Garber. "They have real good size defensemen who'll come out and try to whack us around."

For UMass, All-American Mark Millon just keeps piling up the points as he has 23, including 16 goals and seven assists. Teammate Wes Depp also had a good weekend against Hofstra and Duke and now has 10 goals and two assists. Anchoring the defense tomorrow will be goalies Rip Correnti and Tom LoPresti.

"They [Providence] will try to stall and not really play lacrosse," said Garber. "What we have to do is not get impatient and commit any stupid penalties. If we do that and hit all our shots, we should do fine."

Lax Notes: Mark Millon scored his 113th goal against Duke, placing him fourth on the career goals list . . . UMass and Providence have a common opponent in Hofstra: both lost to the Flying Dutchmen, 16-8 and 19-6 respectively . . . the Gorillas dropped to 15th (from 10th) in the USILA poll after their loss to Hofstra but the poll was conducted before they defeated #11 Duke (now ninth) on Sunday. Wins tomorrow and Saturday against Yale could result in a seven or eight place jump in the poll next week.

Scott's Shots roll on with a designated hitter

Dan
WETZEL

With this space's founder and author, David Scott, home to celebrate Passover with The Shirl, the job of writing "Scott Shots" has fallen to me. Although I initially refused David's request that I guest-write the column, I finally agreed to, realizing this may be the greatest honor I ever receive as a writer.

Of course, following a legend is never easy. Guest-writing "Scott Shots" is comparable to following Bear Bryant on the Alabama sidelines, Adrian Cronaeur on Vietnam radio and John Wooden as UCLA basketball coach. I will obviously be overshadowed by my predecessor.

On top of all that, I do not own a dog, my visits to Montague, Mass. are infrequent and although my tie collection does contain a few heavy hitters, I am by no means, nor wish to be, the cravat king of UMass.

This said, I humbly tackle my difficult task.

• The biggest sports news of the week (you know David is not writing this because I just mentioned sports) did not come from the Final Four or even major league baseball but from the antics of Wrestlemania IX (then again, maybe I didn't mention sports).

The obvious headline grabber was the thrilling way the Hulkster recaptured the WWF title, by ducking the salt thrown from the crafty Mr. Fuji and delivering a big leg drop on two-ton Yakasuma. It was Hogan's greatest performance since his role as Thunderlips — The Ultimate Male in "Rocky III."

In other wrestling news, rumor has it Chancellor Richard O'Brien is standing in the way of bringing the wrestlers to the Mullins Center. Apparently he is still angry the British Bulldogs lost the tag team title. Hopefully our new chancellor will see things the other way.

• Chris "Time-out" Webber will be in the NBA next season.

• Even though the UMass lacrosse team is on the road for awhile, Minuteman fans can still be close to action courtesy of WMUA (91.1 FM) and "The Voice of UMass Lacrosse," Mike Fagerson. After only a few "Maarrk MILlon to the net, SCOOORE!" you'll think you're on The Hill. If you suck down a couple of cold ones while listening the effect is even better.

Fagerson also must gain acclaim for his work with Daily Hampshire Gazette sports editor Jim "I can't touch the rim" Degnim on Amherst Community Cable for their work covering the Amherst Regional Girl's Basketball team.

It's unfortunate "Jam-EE-La WIDE-man" is graduating.

• While this space regularly bashes the NHL, this week will be its reprieve.

The B's look good and will likely claim another Adams title, sweep through the divisional playoffs and hopefully let Cam get seven games to return the favor to Ulfie.

• At this point Rocket looks like the easy favorite for the Cy Young award and Greenwell should be battling for the RBI title by September.

Hobson's boys should go toe-to-toe with the Florida Marlins in October, proving this really is THE year.

• If Clemens is the best pitcher in the Commonwealth, then fireballing Minutewomen Darlene Claffey must be second.

• Overlooked in March Madness was the intramural play of Five Angry Clingons, who fell one game short of the Final Four only because the big Turk, Tsan "I look

Tuition, fees to rise by 4 percent in fall

By KENDRA WILLETT
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees yesterday voted to raise both tuition and fees at the University by 4 percent for the next academic year.

Fees, such as student activities, athletic, authority, Fine Arts Center and student health fees, are all mandatory and included in the increase.

The tuition and fee hike is slated to begin next semester and will bring the total cost of attendance up by $864 for a full year.

According to Chancellor Richard O'Brien, this increase is both necessary and in line with inflation and increases in the cost of living.

O'Brien said he recommended the increase because he foresees many more expenses in the years ahead. He added that a gradual increase will be better for students, allowing them to plan ahead.

"Without the increase, the University would suffer from a $5 million shortfall next year," O'Brien said. "And even with the increase, UMass will still be $2 million short."

O'Brien said that for every $3 collected from the 4 percent rise in tuition and fees, $2 will be set aside for financial aid.

Approximately 20 trustees voted on the increase, according to Student Trustee Kevin Newnan, with only three opposing the hike, himself included.

"We suffer from substantially outrageous fees already," Newnan said. "And now we have been blown off our course towards lowering expenses."

-Newnan said the trustees wanted an

Nuclear explosion mars Russia

Radioactive cloud threatens river, 11 Siberian villages

By ALAN COOPERMAN
Associated Press

MOSCOW — A radioactive cloud moved across Siberia on Wednesday after a tank of radioactive waste exploded in what the government called the worst nuclear accident since Chernobyl.

Russian and foreign experts said Tuesday's explosion at the Tomsk-7 nuclear weapons complex was far less severe than the 1986 Chernobyl disaster. But a spokesman for the environmental group Greenpeace said several villages were at risk from windborne fallout.

No deaths were reported and no one was evacuated from the contaminated region, about 1,700 miles east of Moscow. Only one fireman received a high dose of radiation, said Georgy Kaurov, head of the Nuclear Energy Ministry's information department.

The State Emergency Committee said radiation levels around Tomsk-7 were .03 roentgens per hour Wednesday. Northeast of the plant, levels were .04 roentgens.

The average acceptable dose for nuclear workers is 2 roentgens per year, according to the International Commission on Radiological Protection. A roentgen is measure of the human body's exposure to radiation.

Russian authorities said the wind blew the radiation away from Tomsk-7, a secret military city built by the Soviets, and the much larger nearby city of Tomsk, which has about 500,000 inhabitants.

Tomsk-7 does not appear on ordinary maps, and its exact population is unknown.

Commonwealth television said the Russian Air Defense Command was monitoring the radioactive cloud, which was moving northeast toward less densely populated areas at a height of 1.2 miles and a speed of 22 mph.

Late Wednesday, the cloud passed north of Ashino, a town of about 30,000 people 75 miles northeast of Tomsk, according to Dmitry Tolkatsky of Greenpeace's Moscow office.

Tolkatsky said the cloud was heading toward the Yenisei River in the general direction of 11 Siberian villages, each with a few thousand inhabitants.

"They keep saying there's no danger and no evacuation is planned, but the situation in those villages is unpredictable," Tolkatsky said.

L.A. ready for 2nd King verdict

By DEBORAH HASTING
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Armored personnel carriers have moved in. Police are packing rubber bullets and tear gas. Korean-American merchants have stocked up on guns. Even churches are ready, making plans to stay open as long as necessary and patrol neighborhoods.

The city is nervous as the second Rodney King beating trial draws to a close, but determined to avoid a repeat of the devastating riots that followed acquittals in the first trial last spring.

Jury deliberation in the federal trial are expected to begin on Good Friday and could continue through Easter. Almost every resident prays violence will be avoided.

Police Chief Willie Williams and Mayor Tom Bradley promised this week to send 6,500 uniformed officers into the streets as soon as deliberations begin. Those officers will carry special riot-control gear and a serious attitude.

"We're not going to fail you this time," Williams told Los Angeles.

His predecessor, Daryl F. Gates, was accused of not caring and not acting quickly enough last spring when the state jury acquitted four White officers of most charges in the March 3, 1993, beating of the Black motorist.

What followed were three days of wanton lawlessness in which 54 people died and 10,000 businesses were destroyed. Damage estimates reached $1 billion.

"People cannot afford to lose anymore or have any more damage done to their communities," said Tony Salazar, co-chair of Rebuild L.A., a private group of business and community leaders formed after the riots.

"People in Los Angeles are generally tired of it and want to put the riots behind them."

On Wednesday, a trial was postponed until July for three Black defendants charged with attacking White trucker Reginald Denny at the start of the riots.

Police officers carry rubber bullets and tear gas. The National Guard has moved in armored personnel carriers. Churches throughout South Central will open as soon as the verdicts are read and remain open as long as they are needed.

The First AME Church held a meeting Wednesday night to review church leaders' strategies for patrolling their neighborhoods, staffing a rumor-control station and caring for their youngsters.

"We need to have a voice of reason," church spokesman Mark Whitlock said. "We need to have a calm, analytic

Student gov't lobbies state for litigation

By ALYSSA M. OWENS
Collegian Staff

A few undergraduate student senators travelled to Beacon Hill yesterday to lobby for the reinstatement of litigation rights for University Legal Services.

"We gained support of some (state) senators there," said Senator Emily Rose, during the Senate's meeting last night. "A lot of the representatives asked for letters of support from President Hooker," said Rose, who traveled to Boston with Student Government President David Nunez and Student Registrar Ellen Grossman.

Senate Speaker Matthew Pavesi said that state Sen. Stan Rosenburg and state Rep. Ellen Story are currently working on amending the General Laws to make it legal for University Legal Services to assist students in suing the University.

The amendment will be presented to the State Committee on Arts, Humanities and Education for further consideration, Pavesi said.

"This is a step in the right direction," Pavesi said, noting that the Senate has failed many times in its attempts to get litigation reinstated by the Board of Trustees.

Pavesi said as long as Gordon Oakes chairs the Board of Trustees the reinstatement of litigation rights for Legal Services will never happen.

If the state passes the reinstatement of Legal Services' right to litigate, it will override the Board of Trustees' position, Pavesi said.

Several Senate members met with Chancellor Search Committee members Saturday, urging them to reopen the search for chancellor of the University of Massachusetts' Amherst campus.

"[All of the Senate members present] shared the opinion of what qualities the new chancellor should have," Senator Mike Poster said.

Speaker Matthew Pavesi said, although the reopening of the search was favored by all Senate members present at the meeting, some felt that not all the chancellor candidates were unqualified for the job.

Pavesi said the Senate members who met with the Chancellor Search Committee agreed that

Cannabis on Campus

It seems that UMass isn't the only campus interested in the legalization of marijuana. Various organizations at the University of Michigan held a Hash Bash. According to The State News, the independent voice of the University of Michigan, it was billed as "part political rally, part party." The bash had representatives from all walks of life. University police made numerous arrests for smoking marijuana on university property. Almost 3,000 people showed up for the event, which Ann Arbor police described as "laid back." Maybe they'll be the next school to pass a hemp initiative. The UMass Cannabis Reform Coalition is already sending flyers.

Flashers Beware

A man at the University of Pittsburgh was arrested after a two-month investigation surrounding a series of flashings. The 19-year-old male student was identified after a victim recognized his photograph, according to The Pitt News.

Police said they believe he is responsible for more than a dozen incidents reported since last fall. The suspect did his "exposing" in classroom windows during afternoon classes.

Well, that's one way to perk up that 2:30 p.m. class in Bartlett Hall.

Or Your Money Back

The University of Cincinnati said it may refund money to students who have missed classes because of a professors strike. Students are angry because their classes have not met and the administration is doing little to resolve the strike.

Tim Schorr, a graduate music student, said the university should offer a 10 percent refund for each week of the strike.

UMass undergraduates should keep that in mind the next time the Graduate Employee Organization is milling about the Student Union steps during the noontime hour.

Bungee Jumping Chancellors?

Students at the University of Texas were shocked to read The Daily Texan and find out that their beloved chancellor, William Cunningham, had been bungee jumping when his cord broke, propelling him one half mile into a Douglas fir tree. Rescue efforts involved a tow truck, students and the local Teamsters.

The story was part of the paper's April Fool's Day parody issue. If they decide to reopen the UMass chancellor's search committee, maybe they should start contacting bungee jumping clubs.

Is there a penalty for early withdrawl?

A sperm bank located near Purdue University is holding an open house, said The Purdue Exponent. The facility will be open to all interested and curious individuals in order to gain more information and have a better understanding of how the facility will work.

The bank is a medical institution and has strenuous qualifications for potential donors. Donors can receive $50 for their "contributions."

Maybe plastic research isn't all they'll be doing in Polymer Research Center.

Queen of the Pits

Also at Purdue University, which is in Indiana, they choose a Grand Prix Queen. The women are kidnapped, asked to reveal their most embarrassing moments and also take a quiz about the Grand Prix. Sounds like great fun, eh?

Center searches for coordinator

First applicant speaks at Josephine White Eagle Center

By FRANCIS ZERA
Collegian Staff

"Serious community building" is necessary to increase student involvement in the Josephine White Eagle Cultural Center, said Sharon Smith, a candidate for program coordinator.

Six people attended Wednesday's open forum at the Center in Chadbourne House to hear the program coordinator candidate's ideas. Smith said her primary responsibility would be to provide a "support network" for Native American students.

This support network would include assisting with "culture shock" and providing academic and personal counseling, Smith said. She added that the center itself provides "a haven" for Native American students where they can gather together and support one another.

Smith said she has been involved with the center since the early '80s, when as an undergraduate she was involved in the formation of the beginnings of the cultural center. She cited an extensive background in "all aspects of program planning and management with and for college students."

The center has been without a coordinator for some time, and Smith said if she was chosen, she would design a program only after "assessing student needs" through questionnaires and direct contact with the Native American student body. This, in addition to promoting "serious community building," would provide a "support network for students."

Smith said she saw the position of center coordinator as being "community liason," and she also said that "once Native students put things together," then the possibility exists for joint functions with other cultural Residential Student Organizations.

A "series of seminars" was also offered by Smith, which would be "taught by people expert in their field, but not necessarily Ph.D. types," as the "cross-cultural understanding" of the varied backgrounds of Native American students were not always understood by them.

When asked how she would deal with an incident of a racial attack, she said that her response would be dependent upon the circumstances, but she would "ask University officials to address the problem" and to take appropriate legal steps.

Smith said that "local non-student Native Americans are encouraged to participate" in the center's programs and in the "haven" provided by the center itself.

Mary Elizabeth Lagoy, also a candidate for Josephine White Eagle Cultural Center program coordinator, will be present at an open forum today at noon in Chadbourne House. There are a total of six candidates for this postion.

Student input bounces back after no-show

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

Although not a single student showed up at the first Housing Review forum, eight days later, Housing Review Committee Chairperson Mary Ellen Sailer is looking through reams of housing recommendations made by students, faculty and staff.

Since early February, Sailer and 16 other committee members have been evaluating Housing Services in how they serve students' needs. They will forward their recommendations to the Dean of Students Office at the semester's end.

There was greater attendance at the next two meetings held last Tuesday in the Worchester Dining Commons and then on Thurdsday in the Campus Center, Sailer said. She said there were 30 people attending the second meeting and 40 to 50 people at the third. To encourage greater response, Sailer distributed comment sheets around the campus in which she got over 40 responses.

"It has been very good. I really appreciated the outpouring of response, whether in writing, in forums or calling me, which I appreciate," Sailer said. "People can continue to give comments to us."

There have been many questions raised about discipline procedures in the dorms, said Sailer. The committee does not have the authority to change the discipline procedures, Sailer said, and can only review them.

Sailer said she promised that the committee's evaluations on how discipline procedures affect residential life will be passed on to the Dean of Students.

"[Discipline procedures are] important to review," Sailer said. "Some people think the policies are too strict

MassPIRG hopes to bolster ESA

By KENDRA WILLETT
Collegian Staff

Wrapping up a campaign encouraging Congress to reauthorize and strengthen the Endangered Species Act, MassPIRG hosted a conference which involved four guest speakers yesterday.

Members of MassPIRG have been working hard trying to get students involved by writing letters to Congress insisting that certain changes be made.

These changes include appropriate funding for the act, and better protection of the ecosystems in which these species are found.

The reauthorization of the Endangered Species Act is one of the most critical environmental issues of the 1990s, said Donald Arganbright, head of the University's department of forestry.

"The ESA is a critical piece of legislation," Arganbright said, "And I stress the importance of protecting ecosystems that the species live in."

Jessica Jackson, a student at Smith college who works with the UMass chapter of MassPIRG, commented on the overbearing power of humans.

"Never before has one species exercised such control over all the others," Jackson said. "Now, Homo sapiens have become the dominant life form."

Also speaking on behalf of adjustments being made to the ESA bill was Tom Tyning, a representative from the Massachusetts Audubon Society.

Tyning stressed the importance of preserving ecological diversity and also provided argument against common myths about the ESA.

Acknowledging that the extinction of species is a natural process, Tyning also told the audience that the rate of which some extinctions were tak-

Graphic Spanish film in poor taste

This past week, students of Spanish 240 were required to view La Historia Officiale during their spare time. At a later date, they are to write a composition about the film, get grades and, for the most part, that will be it. For many who saw this film, unfortunately, that may not be it.

This film contains a rather graphic and disturbing wife-beating episode in the last few minutes of the story. This scene lingered in my mind as I left the viewing room and went on my way to study. I really wasn't in any mood after that, however. It would have been easy to dismiss that film as a piece of fiction. It wasn't that simple.

With the rising rate of domestic abuse in this country, as well as the recent Tara Hartnett case in nearby Sunderland, showing this film was in rather poor judgment.

Didn't anyone in the Spanish department realize that this is a difficult issue? Did anyone bother viewing the film beforehand, or was it just deemed acceptable because it was a foreign language film? What if students watching this were dealing with the issue at the time, or have in the past?

Of course I realize that the purpose of the Spanish department is not to act as a political forum and delve into social issues. This is precisely why this film was not entirely appropriate. There are no trained advocates to discuss the films afterward, and classroom discussion of the films, should they occur, tend to focus on grammar and pronunciation rather than content.

While this may be seen as only a slight error in judgment by the department, precautions should be taken in the future to ensure a more acceptable Spanish movie.

Divorced parents' kids aren't doomed to misery

O.K., so I've cut a few classes and passed in a few late papers. I really shouldn't smoke ever or frequent the local pubs as often. And golly, my language and table manners can be down right appalling if I'm upset or hungry. But I never considered myself one of "many of our most vexing social problems."

That is, until I heard about Barbra Dafoe Whitehead.

A card-carrying member of Amherst's Ph.D. Patrol (I think they have a softball team called the Ivory Towers and play in the Wine and Cheeze Circuit League), Whitehead believes, "It is not an exaggeration to characterize [family disruption] as a central cause of many of our most vexing social problems."

Marc
ELLIOTT

Whoa, she's talking about divorced parents, single moms, their children, me. When was it decided that I was a vexing social problem?

"Family diversity in the form of increasing numbers of single parent and stepparent families does not strengthen the social fabric," Whitehead writes. "It dramatically weakens and undermines society, placing new burdens on schools, courts, prisons and the welfare system." Imagine my surprise to find out I'm such a troublemaker. I had no idea I was being such a bother, really.

I really ought to thank "Dr." Whitehead for warning me about all these future problems I'm going to face. I suppose I've already been a real pain-in-the-ass for my school (there's a slew of University administrators that will attest to this), but now I'll be prepared for all that court, prison and welfare stuff. Oh boy, Judge Wapner, three free square meals and roof, and free checks from the government (just hope there isn't a line).

"Contrary to popular belief, many children do not 'bounce back' after divorce or remarriage," she says. "Children who grow up in single parent or stepparent families are less successful as adults, particularly in the two domains of life — love and work — that are most essential to happiness."

And here I might have gone on to live a happy and successful life without ever knowing I was destined to fail. Gosh.

My parents' divorce and my father's marriage to another woman wasn't fun to grow up with. It was often painful and confusing. It often left my younger sister and I to fend for ourselves and face the trials of life without the parental shield. The ordeal went on for five years; five years from separation to the signing of the final papers. But then it was over.

No, I suppose I didn't "bounce back" from my parents' divorce. Yes, I probably don't have the financial backing I would have if mom and dad had stayed together. I do not remain unaffected by those years. They will stay with me for the rest of my life and helped form much of the person I am today. But I don't consider that bad.

Most have heard the saying, "That which does not kill me makes me stronger." Well, hardship builds character and, if anything, my upbringing left me with the will to succeed. Hardship and difficult circumstances may create barriers for people, but hey, "no pain, no gain." You've got to learn sometime.

Mom got a divorce and raised her kids alone. Her son will graduate from a fairly decent university this spring and her daughter will enter college next year in the fall. Both know it is wrong to lie, cheat and steal. Both will stand up for themselves if they believe their position is the most honorable. Both did a little more housework than other kids. Both learned to deal with responsibility and bill collectors at an early age.

Both know how to survive in the world on their own.

And both know there is an aging, strong and caring woman, and an aging, strong and caring man for that matter, who would both do anything for their children if they needed it. Neither children have, nor plan to, rob any liquor stores.

Sure mom had to go to work. She had to leave her kids at home alone now and again. The kids had to pick up some survival skills like how to do laundry, scare up a meal and do some minor maintenance around the house.

She didn't have the money to hire illegal aliens to babysit like rich and powerful lawyers like Zoe Baird. She doesn't have prominent, wealthy lobbyists like Patrica Ireland to defend her.

What she does have are two children who love her dearly and an Amherst intellectual who says she failed her kids.

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

You're in for a real treat today. Those benevolent goddesses in Ed/Op have granted me a final wish for graduation — one more shot at messing up Notes. Bless me, Father, for I have sinned. . .

So yeah, here I am four years later and most of my attempts at a social life have been a comedy of errors. Or should I say a comedy of terrors. Those in the know will either laugh or break out the .357 and gun me down.

But my best-ever night out? Oh, it was a doozy. We ate. We laughed. We made fun of fire fighters. Indeed, my evening with my friends Robin and Rebecca, the Peterson sisters, was a night to remember. Like me, they're from the Berkshires and as we all know, people from the Berkshires are just too cool. And modest, too.

I saw a sign proclaiming "The Radical Student Union is reforming." If they reformed they wouldn't be very radical, would they? "Sorry, folks, we're mainstream now." How sorry we would be. A UMass without a "day of political action" would be like Jonestown Kool-Aid without the cyanide — tasty, but a real letdown if that's what you expected.

President Clinton's programs stalled in Congress? Coach Cal gets a pay raise? All three candidates for chancellor reek of mediocrity? They're letting me graduate? Amy Fisher writes a book? Governor Carvalho? Who knew?

Covering the men's lacrosse team has it's perks — namely the chance to travel to other college towns. So far I've been to Charlottesville, Va., and Hempstead, N.Y. Considering the latter is on Long Island and the former is not, you've probably figured out by now that I liked Virginia better. After all, Virginia is for lovers. Long Island is for hairspray and make-up jobs that look like they were applied with the Wagner Power Painter.

Yes, I survived Planet Long Island, where the scenery goes "expressway, suburb, suburb, mall, suburb, college, club (it's not a "bar"), expressway, mall, suburb." Vive la difference. What's more amazing is that I survived without being able to speak the language. "Eye do nawt tawlk funny."

Greg
SUKIENNIK

What Hempstead did have, however, was an invasion. Not by armed cultists or guilt-ridden liberal morons, but by Jerry's Kids. That's right, we shared our hotel with fans of the Grateful Dead, who were playing next door at Nassau Coliseum. Words do not begin to describe what the parking lot of a Dead show is like — you'll have to see for yourself. But bring extra tickets, because 50 people will come up to you and say, "Cash or trade for your extra ticket. I need a miracle."

Speaking of deadheads, it's getting warm outside and before you know it, the "crunch steps" of the Student Union will be crunchy once more. Say what you want, but you've gotta love these Earthfoods-eatin', Doc Martin-wearin', hacky sack-playin', tie-dye-sportin' folks who turn a sunny day into a counter-culture seminar by the pond.

I never thought I'd get into "Dead" culture four years ago, but that shows you how much things can change. I don't own any tie-dyed items, and I wear docksiders, not Doc Martins. But I'm learning the chords to "Sugar Magnolia." The bent notes are tricky.

As for the Student Union, if the University had any clue what the front steps were going to be used for when the building was designed, they would have added a drawbridge and a moat filled with hungry alligators. I'd pay to see it.

The Overheard Department: Sometimes, you can't help but hear tidbits of conversation that sound really funny out of context. Consider the following:

"I think it was Tequila."

"And then our two bodies melded into one."

"But it was high-impact plastic!"

"I don't know, I think it's a hernia."

"This french fry tastes just like a potato."

Truth in advertising alert: Peoples' Market now lists the ingredients of everyone's favorite bagel topping, Pub Cheese. That's not cause for alarm — it's totally wholesome. But I had more fun trying to figure out what the heck it was. Think about it. "Pub cheese." Hmmmmm.

One more thing. For the last time, it's S-u-k-i-e-n-n-i-k.

Until next time, remember: "It's electric. Boogie woogie woogie!"

Control, insecurities are partners in a dance of abuse

My best friend was once in a relationship with someone she cared deeply about, but something wasn't quite right.

Simply put, her boyfriend made her feel bad about herself. He hated all of her friends and made disparaging comments about them whatever chance he got. He hated her mother, and wasn't above letting her know it. Deep down, she knew that he was jealous of her need for other people in her life, but nevertheless, he made her second guess many of the relationships that meant so much to her.

He told her that in comparison to her muscular legs, her slight upper body made her look deformed, and he offered to start her on a weight training regimen to correct the flaw. She felt like a freak. Why hadn't anyone ever told her before that she was deformed?

Mortified, she accepted his offer, and within months, her arms grew to the size of small saplings. He was incredibly proud, but she wasn't. They were not her arms. They were his. Everything was his: her taste in art, her small group of friends, her ability to make decisions, everything. So little by little, she let him take the reigns to her life. It was easier that way.

Emotional battering. It's an insidious form of abuse that wreaks havoc on the mind of the victim. All about control, it stems from the insecurities of the giver and his or her need to be the superior, powerful entity in the relationship. Free will in a lover is viewed as a threat, because the will to make minor decisions implies the will to leave the relationship.

Consequently, all traces of independence and self esteem must be banished. The abuse can range from simple nicknames like "Dum Dum" to boldly sneered comments like, "Do you really think you should be eating that?" accompanied by a cruel and insinuating pat on the rump.

Lori
O'CONNOR

Mental abuse is an easy trap to fall into, because whether we like to admit it or not, we're all insecure to some degree. When someone comes along under the guise of caring and begins treating you like the helpless child that you may secretly suspect yourself to be, an endless struggle for approval and acceptance ensues. It is not a blatant form of abuse, because unlike a punch or a slap, it often takes time to realize what is happening. I am nothing becomes the victim's twisted mantra. No one else will ever want me, she convinces herself. And this is the exact response the abuser intended. And so the relationship continues on in a crazy dark dance of self hate and quiet suffering.

Breaking this cycle is the hardest part. One day, that middle of the night reality check phone call rings in the pit of your stomach, and you realize that there is someone out there who is your absolute ideal compatibility-wise. Someone who will recognize that you need the companionship of others as much as you need their own. Someone who will admire your strength instead of crushing it out. Someone who will allow you to pursue your dreams, yet will remain a presence in the background, gently holding your hand and whispering words of encouragement. This realization that you are a worthy individual with a lot to offer the right person is the crucial first step in healing the invisible scars that emotional battering induces.

My best friend came to this realization slowly, but today, she's thriving. No longer a quasi-codependent wretch, she has learned to love herself in all her faulty human splendor. She now understands that life is all about constant growth, and that personal perfection will never be the harbinger of romantic bliss. Though her imposing pecs have long since atrophied, her inner strength has only continued to flourish in a hard won atmosphere of self acceptance and contentment.

I am my best friend. We are one and the same, and it was my realization of this fact that freed me from the psychological fetters of a wrecking ball relationship, and transformed the once terrifying concept of being alone into a noble, empowering adventure.

Mental spring cleaning

Now that the snow has disappeared and the sun has shown its face, I can finally begin my spring cleaning of the mind.

Spring cleaning is the time every year when I search through my proverbial closet and air out or get rid of all the things that have puzzled, bothered or just plain ticked me off over the previous winter. Let's see what I find.

HSCN — Our wonderful cable package. . . Would someone please explain to me the advantage of this setup?

Matt
VAUTOUR

Other than the movies and the oh-so ever popular WOCH, there is very little that separates this "cable" network from regular television.

A normal cable package (i.e. the one that the Bluewall has) includes basic favorites such as MTV, Nickelodeon ("Ren and Stimpy") and ESPN (which televises several UMass hoop games).

Students, for the most part, would be willing to pay more to get more. Many other schools offer a normal cable package, why not us?

I'm genuinely curious: is there a noticeable difference between the dining commons' "Chopped Sirloin Special" and the "quarter pound burger?"

Men Bashing — I believe strongly in equal rights between the sexes, but sometimes women hinder their own cause.

Gloria Steinem has inspired women all over the country. In her speech at UMass, she was quoted as saying, "If only men had real lives. . ."

This brought a cheer from the crowd, but what does saying that really accomplish? Unfair images and stereotypes breed the ills of sexism and racism, and created the inequality to begin with.

Stereotyping men isn't going to do anything to really help their cause.

Exactly what is that crunchy stuff that the dining commons' "Southern Fried Steak" is cooked in?

Health Services — I went in with flu symptoms and the doctor is in my face offering me free condoms. I agree it's good to promote safe sex, but with a fever, a runny nose and a constant cough, sex is an unlikely prospect.

People who find entertainment value in "Jim's Journal" — Today I got up. I had breakfast. It tasted lousy. Then I wrote this editorial. That's it! This is not a funny comic strip!

But yet I see people buying "Jim's Journal" books and wearing Jim T-shirts. If you really have nothing better to spend your money on, the Matt Vautour College Fund and the Adopt a Collegian Columnist Program is accepting donations now. Operators are standing by.

The dining commons has had Greek Night, Asian Night and Italian Night. How about "Food that Tastes Good Night?"

St. Bonaventure's uniforms — Who were the marketing geniuses that came up with these beauties? Yellow and brown?! Here is a school that must not rely on revenue from selling merchandise in the school's colors. Just what is a Bonnie anyway?

WOCH — I'm sorry but you have to be sayin' some pretty vulgar and graphic things to get a cable radio station shut down. Particularly on a campus called UMass.

People who have nothing better to do than use the Collegian as gripe space.

In defense of the Garden State

It was a sunny Monday morning and I was on the South Amherst bus, headed for my first class of the week. I happened to overhear a young man pontificating loudly about a job interview he had over the weekend in New Jersey, "the armpit of the nation." These five words had scarcely crossed his lip when dark clouds blocked the sun and the floor of the bus engulfed this poor, ignorant soul, much to the horror of his fellow PVTA passengers. Well, that part did not actually happen, but I have a very active imagination.

I would like to set the record straight regarding New Jersey for this individual as well as for the rest of the inhabitants of the other 49 states. New Jersey is not the smelly, slimy, industrial wasteland it has come to be recognized as. Severe misconceptions have developed due to the fact that the New Jersey Turnpike, one of the most heavily traveled toll roads in the nation, goes through the industrial sector of the state. While New Jersey does have the second largest chemical industry in the United States, this by no means encompasses the entire state.

The state is really beautiful, in fact. There are coastal plains, rolling hills and stretches of mountains. Almost two-thirds of the state's land is in farms and woodlands. The farms have the highest gross average income in the nation, hence the "Garden State." The state is the most densely populated, yet it has the largest wilderness area east of the Mississippi. It is one of only four states where it is possible to see 200 species of birds in one day.

There are numerous historical sites in New Jersey, including the United States' first historical park. The telephone, telegraph, motion picture and electric light were all invented in New Jersey, and there are historical sites for each one.

Believe it or not, tourism is New Jersey's second largest industry. It generates about $11 billion a year, three-fourths of which comes from the shore. New Jersey has the distinction of being the fifth most popular state among tourists.

You have probably guessed by now that I am an enraged New Jersey resident. There is a fairly large number of New Jersey residents who attend schools outside our state. I am fairly confident in assuming that they too are sick of the stigma unfairly attached to our state. My desire is to chip away at this stigma, to make New Jersey residents proud of their state, and to make people more cautious about casually throwing derogatory remarks. You never know who may be sitting near you in a crowded bus.

Marginalization is never justified

"Congress shall make no law. . . abridging the freedom of speech," or so claimed the First Amendment of the Angloamerikkkan [sic] Constitution of 1791.

It is dully noted that this claim to freedom, which given the conditions of Africans and other slaves at the time of inception, is one of the grounds on which contemporary liberals attempt to make a claim to an objective neutrality of procedure. In other words our current apologists and confused defenders of the rights of the people, which until recently were Euro-Amerikkkans [sic], seek to justify the marginalization, stigmatization and oppression of the traditionally enslaved "minorities."

Thus, any printing that contributes to the stereotyping and oppression of "people of color" which is legitimized by these liberal claims to an objective procedural neutrality are in fact legitimizing and protecting the 200-plus years of constitutional illegitimacy. In this manner, the Massachusetts Daily Collegian is guilty as charged for publishing racist propaganda, such as Michael Morrissey's column [Collegian, April 2], "Low Standards."

First of all, UMass claims to be a public institution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, not of Anglo-Amerikkka [sic]. Thus any national pseudo-statistics are not necessarily reflective of the conditions and population of the state.

As for the quality of this institution, I do believe that some staff, faculty and other members of this community actually contribute to accredit this institution. Thus it should be clear that by increasing the enrollment and retention of the traditionally underserved and marginalized "minorities," UMass may actually be improving its ratings as a diverse, concerned and committed public agency. Public institutions should be bastions of learning and education for the public, and not neo-feudal factories of an elite class of people.

Moreover, Euro-Amerikkkan [sic] high school grades don't necessarily reflect the potential intellect of underserved and marginalized students who have been denied the resources to a better and more inclusive curriculum.

As for Mr. Morrissey's paranoia regarding Alex Delgaso and James Cyr, I would like to remind him that Mr. Delgaso, having served in the U.S. Army, and Mr. Cyr, being a "good" brother of Phi Sigma Kappa Fraternity, have yet to be proven guilty in a court of law. Furthermore, to even suggest that "minorities" are potential "rapists and/or killers" would force us to consider the Black/African-American athletes in the basketball team, and for that matter all "minorities" on the UMass basketball team, to be potentially healthy, conditioned criminals of low standards.

Finally, given Mr. Morrissey's arguments I would much rather recruit an Al Lizana or a David Nunez than a potential David Koresh, Jim Jones, Charles Manson or Jeffrey Dahmer.

Hatch upgrade in the works

Manager says pizza, orange juice to improve soon

By DANIEL BOUCHER
Collegian Staff

Changes at the Hatch have already resulted from ongoing meetings between the Board of Governors' Food Services Committee, Hatch management and the Campus Center Food Services to consider ways of improving products and services offered by the Hatch.

Some of the committee's opinions, expressed in an initial report, were that the orange juice was too warm and the pepperoni pizza too greasy. The report also said, however, that the chicken parmesan dinner was "excellent."

Ron Perrault, the manager of the Hatch, said a repairman had been in twice to fix the thermostat, but a taste test revealed the orange juice was still not cold. Perrault said after a phone call to the Kraft Foods Inc., the manufacturer of the machine, a new orange juice dispenser would be installed at no cost to the Hatch.

Perrault said he agreed the pepperoni pizza was too greasy, and said the Hatch would begin using another company's pepperoni "probably starting in the next day or two." The change, he said, would not affect the price of the pizza.

Perrault said customer input was needed to make changes in the Hatch.

"We react to feedback," Perrault said. For example, he said, he heard no complaints about the orange juice being too warm, so he said he assumed it was fine. He never drinks orange juice himself, he said.

The report also asked for non-carbonated lemonade to be sold in the Hatch as well as carbonated. Perrault said the Hatch would begin selling both carbonated lemonade at the pizza and deli places, and non-carbonated lemonade at the main line even perhaps as soon as today.

"Everybody has their individual opinion," Perrault said, but the challenge "is trying to hit the norm."

The report also praised the calzones, but the Hatch discontinued selling them because of low sales. Perrault said 6,000 pizza slices were sold each month, compared 25 calzones at the most.

The Hatch now sells two once garlic breadsticks at the price of $1.25 for three, and Perrault said 164 orders of breadsticks were sold in the last three weeks.

The Senate voted unanimously last week to emphatically encourage the University to reopen the search for chancellor of the UMass campus.

Vice Chancellor Tom Robinson briefly addressed the Senate, regarding the on-going federal trial of the four Los Angeles police officers involved in the beating of Rodney King.

"I am convinced as a campus community that we need to talk about the implications of this particular case and what we should do in terms of this institution," Robinson said.

"I'm really hoping to express my concerns as this comes into the fold, and ask for your help on these particular issues so we can help guide and lead the institution," Robinson said.

increase because the University needed to generate revenue and keep up with inflation.

Former Student Government President Jen Wood said she was disappointed by the increase.

"This is not a 'small' increase at all," Wood said. "For most students that $432 a semester means books or two months rent."

Tuition and fees over the past five years have risen 47 percent, Wood said.

"Students just can't afford to pay increases like this," Wood said. "And soon enough a middle-class student will not be able to attend this University."

Provost Glen Gordon said he understands the reasons for the increase.

"This is a very modest increase compared to other years," Gorden said. "And although I expect students to be upset, I see no reason for them to be outraged."

Matt Pavesi, speaker of the Undergraduate Student Senate, said he disagrees with Gordon.

"Once again this shows that the trustees are not willing to provide low cost to students," Pavesi said. "And the cost of education is riding on the backs of the students who attend this University.

ing place were being accelerated unnaturally because of humans.

Representing Greenpeace, Greg Whritenour said the ESA was a challenge well within our human capacity.

"Saving the endangered species is not an option when it comes to protecting our own future welfare," Whritenour said.

According to Whritenour, there will be more dedication towards the ESA bill now that Clinton is president. The old administration failed to recognize its needs.

"Let us rise to the challenge of saving the endangered species so that we don't have to apologize for what we should have done in a hundred years," Whritenour said.

High Court to be Cuomo-free

By RON FOUNIER
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Mario Cuomo formally withdrew Wednesday from consideration for the upcoming Supreme Court vacancy before President Clinton had narrowed his list of prospects.

In a letter to Clinton, Cuomo said he wanted to remain as governor to help New York's economic recovery. He said staying in the political world would allow him to "continue to serve as a vigorous supporter of the good work you are doing for America and the world."

The letter was sent to confirm an earlier telephone conversation with Clinton.

Clinton refused earlier in the day to confirm reports of the withdrawal, but said, "I think he's terrific."

Cuomo's decision, which Newsday said was forwarded to Clinton last Thursday, was unknown to some of Clinton's closest advisors until now.

Among the candidates being mentioned by administration officials are Judge Judith Kaye, chief judge of New York's highest state court; Judge Patricia Wald, who sits on the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington; and Judge Richard Arnold of Little Rock, who sits on the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Clinton has by no means limited his choices to those three people, White House officials say.

Cuomo had emerged as a the liberal wing's sentimental choice, though the Clinton inner circle had never tipped its hand about Cuomo's chances.

The loss of a celebrity candidate in Cuomo could rob Clinton of one of the qualities he is seeking in a nominee. Another White House official familiar with the search process said Clinton wanted "someone who will make people say 'Wow' whether they agree with the person or not."

Clinton has said only that he wants a justice who will respect the right to privacy, and argument that is the underpinning for a woman's right to an abortion. Clinton said he would not directly ask any potential nominee his or her position on abortion.

White House officials said Clinton may be trying to make history with his first choice to the Supreme Court. That could help the chances of Amalya Kearse, a New York federal judge who is Black.

She believes in abortion rights, but is considered a moderate-to-conservative. Sen. Arlen Spector, R-Penn, has already said her confirmation would be easy.

response."

Gun sales in Los Angeles increased sharply as jury deliberations neared. Targeted by looters and arsonists during the riots, many Korean-American merchants have vowed to fight fire with gunfire.

In San Francisco, workers at the First Step athletic shoes store will do everything to protect their wares except arm themselves, assistant manager Edgar San Gabriel said. "The first thing we want to avoid in a confrontation," he said.

The store was looted last year. San Gabriel said workers have boarded up the windows every night this week. He and many other San Francisco merchants they would close when the verdicts are announced.

others, think they are too lenient."

Graduate students in the Prince/Crampton complex said they should not have to adhere to the same policies as undergraduates.

And, a resident in living in UMass family housing wrote to Sailer saying there should be tennis courts and a swimming pool for families.

Yet, there was much support for the academic floors and the Two in Twenty Special Interest Residential Program floor.

Freshman pre-med major Irene Mahoney said she enjoyed living on a Washington Tower floor with all biology-related majors as part of the Biological Sciences Advancement Program. And, K.C. Laxton, a freshmen majoring in pre-med and psychology, said it was great in having 49 residents in all the same major.

"It helps quiet a bit. If you don't understand something, there is always someone around in some class to explain it to you," Laxton said.

Sonia Paz, a junior pre-journalism major, living in Mary Lyon said she likes living on her floor, where homosexuals live in a safe environment where most of the residents are heterosexual allies. There are many misplaced stereotypes about the floor, Paz said.

"People would ask, 'Where do you live?' I would say, 'Mary Lyon.' They would say, 'What floor?' And I would say, 'Fourth.' And they would say, 'Un huh,'" Paz said. "What I have have heard on this floor so much is not moving in with your partner, but rather a safe place to be."

Another student, Elizabeth Waller, said she was pleased with living on the floor, but wishes for volume control on the student call boxes at the building's entrance.

"When the voice of the other person comes through [the call box]. Even when we shut our window, we can hear that little voice coming through," Waller said.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Be extra careful in financial matters, and do your best to avoid becoming involved in litigation. If an academic plan needs altering, seek a previously overlooked option.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Getting better organized is the key to career success. You are able to finish a task in record time, gaining new points for your efficiency. Give serious thought to going back to school.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): A good day for looking at property, asking questions or finalizing plans for a weekend trip. The turbulence affecting a personal relationship is strictly temporary.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Be prepared for some last-minute changes in your plans. At work, avoid overreacting; your authority when dealing with co-workers. By tonight, a domestic problem will have resolved itself.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Your finances are in the spotlight. Go slow when making decisions regarding your security. Under-the-table transactions should be avoided at all cost.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Keep your wits about you when discussing money matters with your loved ones. Your mate or partner may get overemotional at times. Establish your priorities and take inventory of where you stand.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): You are a force to be reckoned with! Avoid social encounters that cost you money. Make allowances for a loved one's frayed nerves rather than focusing on your own needs.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Although you are usually an outspoken sort, you could be tempted to kick someone in the head today. Think your moves through carefully. A former employer could provide a job lead. Follow up immediately.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Work delays threaten to interfere with your career goals. Seek your co-workers' cooperation and concentrate on completing routine tasks. Sundown will bring welcome family news.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Do not despair if your have not yet received recognition for a special job. An award or promotion could be on its way. Turn on your well-known charm.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Be cooperative with influential people; spurn the urge to challenge higher-ups or break the rules.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Self-improvement activities are favored now. Dental appointments, medical checkups and a wardrobe updating benefit you. Avoid upsetting your partner about a personal or financial worry.

better-than-average day is the quality of shots they had. Providence had 23 saves on the day, with Rich Dunphy picking up 17 and Bill Duffin stopping 6. Since 18 UMass shots went in, 41 of 50 UMass shots were on goal — which suggests the offense ran exrtemely well for the Gorillas.

Massachsuetts converted on 1 of 7 extra-man advantages, while the Friars made good on 1 of 5.

Ken Ward scored twice for UMass, rounding out their multiple-goal scorers for the game. Attackers Andy Fish and Mike Valente and midfielders Chris Nentwich, Sam Joseph, Greg Kline and Bill Edell all scored a goal for UMass. Eric Triolo and Ernie Faulkner added an assist each.

UMass next travels to New Haven, Conn. to face Yale on Saturday in a contest pitting two New England powers.

Baseball bombs in home opener, 12-2

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

In its first contest of the year at Earl Lorden Field, the University of Massachusetts baseball team proved that one bad inning can truly lose a game by dropping a 12-2 decision to the University of Connecticut.

UMass (6-8) headed into the top of the fourth inning tied 1-1 with the Huskies (10-6), but an 8-run offensive burst by UConn left the Minutemen trailing 9-1 when the inning ended.

Right-hander Lorne Levy started the contest for UMass coach Mike Stone's team, but was only able to get one out in the fourth before the barrage began.

After Levy retired UConn first baseman Jim Tonelli, the tandem of third baseman Chris Bisson and shortstop Paul Funk slapped back-to-back singles, which brought up left fielder Michael Guilbeault.

Guilbeault promptly singled up the middle, plating Bisson and giving the Huskies a 2-1 lead. This run finished off Levy, who pitched just three and one third innings, yielding five hits.

The scoring continued as UMass right-hander Peter Ferrari, one of five pitchers on the day for the Minutemen, came out of the bullpen and replaced Levy. Ferrari fell victim to a passed ball which allowed Funk to score, increasing the lead to 3-1 in favor of UConn.

After UConn designated hitter Kyle Cooney drove in another run with a base hit, Ferrari walked the bases loaded, which brought up center fielder Bryan Majeski. Majeski broke the game open with a two-run single, knocking out Ferrari and giving the Huskies a commanding 6-1 advantage.

Stone then summoned on closer Jay Murphy, who had as little success as his predecessors, but was able to get out of the inning with a double play. As a whole, the UMass pitching staff was roughed up for 14 hits, and is a problem according to Stone.

"Telgheder and Toothaker [Jim and Jeff, two starting pitchers] — and that's it. And that's how bad it is with the pitching staff. We obviously couldn't get anybody out. . . it's a struggle right now," said Stone.

On the offensive end, the Minutemen were able to muster just one run on nine hits against UConn starter John Fisher, who recorded his first victory of the season. Fisher came into the game with a 9.31 earned run average and an 0-1 record.

According to Stone, UMass was unable to get any clutch performances at the plate.

"We are looking for somebody to come through in the clutch situation and it hasn't happened," said Stone.

"I think the hitters had a lack of concentration," said UMass left fielder and leading hitter Justin Howard. "It seemed like we were all just a little off."

UMass' next game is today at Amherst College at 3 p.m. against the rival Lord Jeffs. Freshman left-hander David Dart will get the start for the Minutemen, and the offense will look to produce more run support.

"We have to come out swinging, and be aggressive, and let our talent do the work," said Howard.

Starter Lorne Levy and the UMass baseball team fell to UConn yesterday 12-2 in the home opener at Lorden Field. The Minutemen will look to get back on track as they travel to crosstown rival Amherst College today at 3 p.m.

Mass ready to resume rivalry with UConn

By JASON NASH
Collegian Staff

Today, at 3 p.m., the biggest rivalry in New England softball picks up where it left off in last year's regional finals as the University of Massachusetts softball team travels to the University of Connecticut for a doubleheader against the Huskies.

UMass (6-9 overall, 2-0 in the Atlantic 10), who eliminated UConn (20-7 overall, 8-0 at home) on their way to last year's final four, is looking forward to rekindling the old flame.

"This is one of the healthiest and strongest rivalries in the country," said head coach Elaine Sortino. "These teams have tremendous respect for each other."

While the competition will be there, UConn has the advantage over the Minutewomen, playing almost twice as many games this year. Because of the recent inclement weather, UMass has been forced into a gymnasium for the last two weeks.

"You know, they've had a big jump on us, while we've been sitting on our hands," said Sortino. "They've played 14 games since their West Coast trip. We've played four."

The Huskies come at you in every area of the game, batting a team .307 at the plate while hurling a 1.22 earned run average.

"They're a great team," said UMass leftfielder Stacey Nichols. "Everyone needs to be working together perfectly."

Andrea D'Innocenzo, one of UConn's six regulars hitting above .300, heads into the doubleheader at a scorching .381 clip, with 6 homeruns and 21 runs batted in.

From the mound, Huskie ace Pat Conlan, who is expected to go today, is 10-3 with a staggering 0.33 earned run average.

"She's got pretty good speed and great control," said UMass righthander Darlene Claffey, "but I think we can hit her."

The Minutewomen will attempt to contain UConn's version of "murderers row," most likely, by sending Claffey (3-4) and sophomore Kelly Daut (3-5) to the mound. Both picked up victories in Tuesday's sweep of Boston College and felt fine physically after the twin-bill.

"My arm feels really good," said Claffey. "We'll have to keep the ball low against their offense."

Offensively, UMass is batting .244 as a team, however senior catcher Sherri Kuchinskas has been snacking on opposing pitchers to a tune of .395, with an on-base percentage of .467.

Remarkably, yesterday was the team's first practice outdoors all year long.

"It's tough to come out here from a gymnasium," said Sortino. "And it's great just to work on the little things like watching the ball come off the bat."

While UConn seems to have the advantage, simply because of playing time, Sortino remained extremely positive.

"Hey, the odds are stacked against us, but that's just the way we like it," she said.

Minutewomen facing Hartford today

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

It will be back to the battlefield for the University of Massachusetts women's tennis team today as the Minutewomen (1-1) will be hosting the University of Hartford Hawks (0-0) at nearby Mt. Holyoke College (3 p.m.).

The Hawks lineup, which will be making its 1993 spring debut, will be a young one. Of the squad's six members only two them are upperclassmen with just one of them a senior.

Coaching Hartford is J.B. Nickles, who compiled a 8-12 record in his one season at the helm of the Hawks.

The lone senior on the Hartford squad is Jessica Sklar while the junior is Sarah McShane. There are two sophomore Hawks, Lori Frisher and Hilary Linder.

Rounding out the Hawks are two freshmen, Julie Merrill and Massachusetts native Amy Saviano.

On the UMass side of the net, in singles competition the Minutewomen have done better than their two opponents, Mt. Holyoke and Vermont, posting a 7-5 mark in one-on-one play.

It is in doubles competition where UMass has had its problems, with a 2-4 mark.

According to UMass captain and No. 4 singles player Pam Levine, the Minutewomen doubles tandems have the ability to play with their opponents, it is just a matter of doing it.

"I think that we can compete with anyone (in doubles)," Levine said. "We just have got to put it together on the court."

The Minutewomen have used two different combinations at third doubles and today it will be sophomore Alissa Cohen teaming up with senior Kelly Grim. Cohen and Grim were the third doubles team used against Vermont.

The Minutewomen, they will have a freshman of their own entrenched in the No. 1 singles slot, Liesl Sitton. Sitton has dominated her first two opponents this season winning 24 games to her foe's one.

Levine said that Sitton has proved to be a force.

"She's (Sitton) been doing really good, she has a lot of tournament experience," said Levine. "Liesl has a lot of mental toughness."

The horrendous weather that came with this winter has hurt the Minutewomen, but Levine said that the team has done well and that Coach Judy Dixon has helped tremendously.

"I think under the conditions, we've done the best we could," she said. "She's (Dixon) has been incredible, she knows what we need and she is so smart."

Gorillas romp over Providence

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

John Cavalerio and Wes Depp led a balanced scoring effort, scoring four goals apiece as the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team rolled over Providence College 18-3 yesterday afternoon in Providence, R.I.

UMass players and coaches admitted after last Saturday's Hofstra game, a 16-8 loss, that they had looked past the Flying Dutchmen, a team most thought the Gorillas would beat handily. But there was no letdown against the Friars.

Cavalerio outscored the Friars (1-2) all by himself. He tallied seven points on the day, scoring twice in both halves and assisting three other goals in his best UMass career performance to date.

Depp, who enjoyed his second big scoring day of the season (his first being a five-goal game at St. John's), scored twice in the first, with both assists coming from Cavalerio. He also assisted Cavalerio in the first quarter.

The Gorillas, 3-2, held Providence scoreless through the second and third periods, scoring 10 goals in that time span to put the game away. Tom LoPresti, starting his second game of the year in goal, made nine saves.

UMass coach Ted Garber substituted freely, as 12 Gorillas broke into the scoring column and freshman goaltender Morgan Stanford got some valuable playing time, stopping two shots.

The Friars' Alex Vetter, who led his team with two first-quarter goals, opened the scoring 16 seconds into the game. Providence then proceeded to disappear under a maroon wave of UMass scores and never seriously threatened again.

Massachusetts controlled most facets of the game, dominating face-offs and outshooting PC by nearly a two to one margin. UMass won 18 of 23 face-offs and racked up 50 shots to the Friars' 31. Ground balls, however, were even as the Gorillas collected 52 to PC's 38.

The third quarter has belonged to UMass all season, and yesterday was no exception. Including yesterday's 6-0 third, the Gorillas have shut out four opponents in that time frame, the other three being Duke, Virginia and St. John's.

UMass scored four times in the first five minutes of the third. Depp netted two goals and Cavalerio and Mark Millon (2 goals, 1 assist) added one apiece, denying any thoughts of a comeback the Friars may have had.

Another statistic which suggests the Gorillas had a

Former UMass student searches for the 'truth' in new documentary

By Jon Lupo / Collegian Staff

FILMMAKER BRUCE SINOFSKY remembers the first day of his sophomore year here at UMass vividly. On that cool September evening in 1975, Sinofsky went to a meeting in Northeast to discuss plans for a practical film course, but it was announced that the proposed instructor had bailed out.

That same night, Sinofsky wrote a letter to the New York University film school requesting an application. Later that year, Sinofsky left the University for the bright lights of the City, leaving behind fond memories of shooting hoops in Orchard Hill and the night that Carlton Fisk hit a home run that sent fans from all over the Hill pouring into the bowl.

"It was a very exciting period in my life," Sinofsky said in a recent telephone interview with the Collegian. "I remember bringing my suntan lotion and hanging out on the area between Sylvan and Totman. I had a very good time."

Sinofsky said he was sad to leave the Valley he had called home for two years. "The University simply did not have the practical, hands-on courses I wanted," he says. "They had theoretical courses on things like gangster films, but nothing about how to put a movie together."

Three years later, in 1978, Sinofsky graduated with honors from NYU Film School and began his professional filmmaking career as an editor with Maysles Films, Inc., a highly acclaimed, New York-based nonfiction film studio.

Sinofsky worked on a number of projects at Maysles including a "Nova" special, "Change of Heart" and "Sports Illustrated: The Making of the Swimsuit Issue." Outside Maysles, Sinofsky worked on various films, most notably he edited Joe Berlinger's Outrageous Taxi Stories.

In 1991, both Sinofsky and Berlinger (who, coincidentaly, has Amherst resident relatives) left Maysles and formed their won company, Creative Thinking International. Their first production, the highly acclaimed documentary Brother's Keeper [see review below], has made them both hot properties in the film world.

Brother's Keeper captures the real-life story of 60-year-old Delbert Ward, a poor, nearly-illiterate farmer accused of suffocating his brother, Bill. The pair shared a bed in a run-down

FILM REVIEW

This 'Brother's' a Keeper

By Jon Lupo / Collegian Staff

IN ANY MURDER MYSTERY, the search for the truth fuels the action, and only until the revelation of truth will justice be done. In Bruce Sinofsky and Joe Berlinger's absorbing and haunting documentary, Brother's Keeper, opening tomorrow at Amherst Cinema, these questions of truth and justice are explored to almost dizzying detail. In the end, a version of the truth and a version of justice are indeed revealed — but then it becomes a question of finding the real truth.

My confusing introduction aside, Brother's Keeper isn't your typical documentary. Like all popular fiction films, Keeper focuses on a sympathetic character, casts a few villains and lets the story tell itself. Like Paris Is Burning and Roger and Me, two recent popular documentaries, Brother's Keeper is keenly aware of audience response, and delivers in kind.

Brother's Keeper tells the story of 60-year-old Delbert Ward, who lives in squalor at a dilapidated farm in upstate New York with his four elderly brothers. When Bill dies under mysterious circumstances, Delbert is arrested. After signing an alleged confession, he recants and his elder brother Lyman corroborates his story.

Keeper follows Delbert from the initial arrest through the trial, keeping questions of his guilt or innocence in the audience's hands. The town rallies around the remaining Ward brothers in a groundswell of support of the same people usually shunned by the community.

But more is at stake here, it seems. The ensuing media sharks have descended on the town with a vengeance, playing up the Ward brother's lives as archetypal American gothic. Indeed, the brothers seem to have stepped out of another century, so it becomes a battle to preserve a rural way of life in the face of increasing urbanization.

The death is first seen as a mercy killing, but later lurid questions of incest — Delbert and Bill shared a bed — and sexual violence creeped up during pre-trial investigations. The trial itself is edited well, both Sinofsky and Berlinger know what moments to leave in, when to linger, when to cut. In this way we move considerably out of the realm of objective documentary, but the filmmakers never hide the fact that this is a controlled vision and unlike other documentarians, don't deny it.

Keeper makes good use of neighbor's reflections on the Ward brothers. Early on, a couple who raised the initial $1,000 of Delbert's $10,000 bond say that Delbert "looked just like Jesus Christ" when he came into his arraignment. The filmmakers follow this up when, at the trial, Delbert is seen leaning against the window shade as bright light shines around him. You can't get any more pronounced than

Performance marred by salesman-like antics

Black Uhuru
Pearl Street
March 30

Veteran reggae group Black Uhuru had everyone staying irie last Tuesday night at Pearl Street. Combining old favorites with many songs from their new album Mystical Truth, Black Uhuru's performance was incredible. Black Uhuru had their act together as soon as they walked on stage. Their experience was obvious as they quickly found a groove and brought energy to the audience.

Andrew Tosh opened the evening's show and was an immediate crowd pleaser. His intensity and happiness were quickly transferred to the audience.

Next, Louie Rankin performed but not quite up to par with the other groups. Energy levels were brought back up when Black Uhuru hit the stage.

They entertained the crowd with familiar tunes "Army Band," "Heathen" and "Peace and Love" from the Now album. Black Uhuru also performed an intense version of "Breakout" from their album Iron Storm.

New material from their latest recording Mystical Truth included "Mercy Street," "Give My Love" and "Living in the City." Louie Rankin came back on stage accompanying Black Uhuru for "One Love," the same song they performed together on Mystical Truth.

The audience seemed disappointed by Louie Rankin's constant salesman antics. He really took away from Black Uhuru's performance by trying to sell his T-shirts. He continued in his persistence for the remainder of his time on the stage. This was not only unnecessary but annoying.

Overall, Tuesday night's show was high quality. A strong back up band tied all the performances together. The surprisingly powerful opening by Andrew Tosh as well as the expected high quality from Black Uhuru compensated for Louie Rankin's average performance.

Terminate your relationship with the right tunes

By BRIAN BABINEAU
Collegian Correspondent

Yes, it is now officially springtime, that time when, supposedly, all thoughts turn to warm weather, summer and love. However, spring is not always a season when love blooms. Sometimes, it is a season when love has been torn up by its roots and tossed in the wheelbarrow, only to be dumped in a compost pile to rot away to nothing. With that in mind, I present something that may help anyone who is presently embarking on that long journey to the compost pile.

People do different things when a relationship ends. I listen to music. Certain songs can make you feel better, help you wallow in misery, or make you realize that there are truly people out there with lives more screwed up than yours. There are some guidelines to follow when choosing music to listen to at the end of a relationship. Be careful of listening to too much Cure — you may find yourself dressed in black wearing makeup. Otis Redding can make even the most macho man breakdown into tears. Finally, listening to "Freebird" by Lynyrd Skynyrd is strictly forbidden.

Having said the "don'ts," I will now present the "dos" — the 10 best songs to listen to after a shattered, ugly, horrible, twisted (you get the idea) end of a relationship. Here they are, in order, from 10 to one.

10. "So Cruel" — U2 It's certainly not the best song on Achtung Baby, but lines like "I'm only hanging on to watch you go down," can do justice for anyone feeling unhappy.

9. "I Don't Care Anymore" — Phil Collins Now, I really have no affection for Phil and his music, but this song with vicious drum beats and very blatant lyrics definitely gets the blood pumping. (Perfect for those still in the denial stage of

Boys in plaid invigorate S.U.B. crowd

By JESSICA TAVERNA
Collegian Staff

Visions of three piece suits, platform shoes, and lots of plaid mixed with the sound of Ska/Funk/Metal and an invigorating horn section remedied the post-winter blues with heavy doses of a mighty, mighty performance.

With limber bodies wriggling about, the pit raged on like a sweaty, pulsating beast at the mercy of the Mighty Mighty Bosstones.

Before their April first performance at the Student Union Ballroom, I was able to share words with the tenor saxophone player, Tim Burton. He spoke about their current agenda, which included a leg of their tour spent in Europe and the band's attendance at WFNX's music awards.

When asked about Tim's opinion of the band's growth over the years, he offered some valuable input on the history and future goals of this ingenuous enterprise.

The Bosstones were originally a Boston based band formed by a few high school/college kids for fun. They eventually got to a point where growth was essential and the maturity level had brought the process to a halt. "The music wasn't that great, but we'd get gigs cause we wore that suits and were just, basically, entertaining."

After pursuing different projects (A.K.A Gang Green, etc., etc.) for a few years, the band reformed and solidified. Tim feels that, since their "reformation," they've grown substantially. They play together all the time, so they've become really "tight."

When they were putting things back together, Tim says that they "had a crazy hair across their [expletive] to play Ska." With this interesting blend of heavy metal guitar chords, sped up reggae rhythm, and a funky horn line up, the Bosstones have been able to effectively achieve a genuine sound with no boundaries.

Tim expressed his delight with the band's writing technique, because he feels that it prohibits them from becoming sluggish and rewriting the same songs over and over. "We're meticulous about arrangement. We don't just find a chord and write it out, or play the same power chords over and over."

The growth of this ensemble has caught the attention of the public and is providing them with more and more recognition as they go along. They started at clubs like the Ratt, the Channel, and the Paradise and have now managed to tour America twice and venture onto Europe and England.

Tim used a baseball analogy which explained this phenomena accurately. "In baseball, there are different levels: little league, college ball, pro. Well, it's the same with music; there are small clubs and managers and you climb up the ladder. They don't have the kind of bands in Europe that we do in the States. Their bands wouldn't even be able to carry our jock straps — and I don't say that to sound conceited; they just don't have access to the kind of management we do. You have to give people a chance to grow. American rock is great because we have all those little promoters that give us the chance to grow."

Well, needless to say, the Bosstones have really surpassed adolescence as a band and hold a bright future in hand. With their more commercial-type tune, "Where Did You Go," the Bosstones have managed to creep into the mainstream by means of an exceptionally unique style of their own.

While 21-year-old drummer, Joe Sirois, the youngest of the group, pumped out a reggae-type rhythm, BIG Dennis B. wailed away on the trumpet, and Dicky Barret and Ben Carr belted out difficult-to-decipher lyrics to songs like "Devil's Night Out," "Dr. D," "He's Back," and "Guns and the Young," the rest of the band tried to avoid over enthusiastic fans jumping around and diving off stage. Altogether, proving to be a high scale success for both the UPC and the Bosstones, and a sweaty good time for their fans.

Huck Finn's adventure is no vacation

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

Huckleberry Finn, that wild, untamed cherub, is back on the screen for yet another incarnation. The Adventures of Huck Finn, released by Walt Disney, embodies every child's dream of liberation from their parents. Director Stephen Sommers' Huck Finn is doubly wonderful in that it's every politically correct parent's dream. Huck Finn trumpets messages such as, "Just because everyone believes an idea, doesn't make it right."

Disney's version is a gorgeous recreation of Americana that makes you yearn for the good ol' days of rafts down the Mississippi river, maidens in distress and lush landscapes.

But don't let yourself believe that this is a corny, soft version of Mark Twain's novel. There is just as much violence here as in . . . well, as in the average American high school.

Elijah Wood plays the role of Huck with just the right mix of mischievous glee and big-eyed innocence. He is convincingly reduced to teeth-chattering terror when his crazed Pap (Ron Perlman) comes after him. This may be a little hard-hitting for the little ones, but it is entertaining, edge-of-your-seat material for the 18 and older crowd.

Other violent scenes and general scariness run a pervasive thread through Huck Finn. Such scenes include the down and dirty fist fight a la Rocky where Huck defends himself against a tow headed instigator, Pap knocking two old ladies around and Huck killing a wild boar only to smear its blood all over the inside of a log cabin.

Jim (Courtney B. Vance) is a runaway slave and Huck's

Words with Hypnolovewheel

By ADAM GOULSTON
Collegian Staff

One of the most pleasant surprises of last week's Loud Music Festival was the fact that New York City's Hypnolovewheel pulled off a tight set, laden with catchy hooks and sharp harmonies despite an exodus from the Iron Horse which left the group with roughly half the audience they began with.

Gauging the reactions of viewers of the Cell set, they would have been better off hanging around for the rest of Hypno's set. They would have been treated to many of the foursome's finest tunes such as the driving opener, "(Here Comes a) Headache" off 1992's Angel Food, and the more sobering "Watermelon Song" off the upcoming Altered States on Alias Records; a song I couldn't help but inquire about.

I had the opportunity to chat with upbeat vocalist/bassist Dan Cuddy and guitarist/vocalist Dave Ramirez about the band's present and future.

Adam Goulston: You guys put on a great set tonight. How do you think it went?

Dan Cuddy: It went really well other than the fact the sound guy cut us off. I know he doesn't like us. I don't think we'll be playing here again.

AG: Were you discouraged by the exodus [to see Cell play Pearl Street] that took place during your set?

DC: No, we've had bigger exodus playing in New York in small clubs. Those guys In Cell are just swell.

AG: How will your upcoming album differ from Angel Food?

DC: Hopefully it'll sell more copies. It's got more ferocious guitars.

AG: What's the "Watermelon Song" about?

DC: [smiling] It's about watermelon, really.

AG: No symbolism?

DC: I guess you'd have to ask Dave [Ramirez] about that. Dave, what's the "Watermelon Song" about?

Dave Ramirez: [also smiling] Watermelon. It's about watermelons growing.

DC: Well, I guess you can infer your own symbols.

AG: So most of your songs are real life stories, like "(Here Comes a) Headache?"

DC: Yeah, I had a really bad migraine and that's what I was thinking.

AG: Mymy-mymymymy? [Please note I was quoting sound lyrics, not stuttering]

DC: Right.

AG: Who are your influences?

DC: Just about everyone — Velvet Underground, the Sex Pistols. Oh yeah and the Monkees.

AG: Will you be playing around here again anytime soon?

DC: No, I don't think so. We won't be playing [at the Iron Horse] again. We're actually opening up for Belly in Hoboken. We won't leave our outfits at home for that one. We'll have our matching white suits on. We're going more Hollywood.

AG: Oh yeah, I just remembered my last question. Your music is pretty listener friendly. Do you ever write stuff just to please yourself?

DC: I write a lot of things to please myself. On nights like tonight, we basically just please ourselves. Yeah, I'd say we always please ourselves.

AG: That was a pretty impressive feedback session you did there.

DR: [smiling bashfully] Yeah, well, hey. . .

As I thanked them and departed without the free T-shirt I'd been secretively campaigning for, Cuddy called, "Give us lots of good press." I hope that's what I'm doing. Hypnolovewheel are a tight and talented band who'll soon have five albums. If you buy one, go for Angel Food and catch the guys next time they're around. It just won't be at Iron Horse, the sound guy hates them.

Tastes from Asia come to downtown Amherst

Lai Lai ushers in new era for Asian cuisine

By KENNETH MAISONET
Collegian Staff

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN
Fish, on the right, brings a new kind of cuisine to Amherst.

There's a new kid in town. Fish, as he is called (Yu Fing-Ping), has come to the Amherst area with a new style of food. He's the proud owner and proprietor of the Lai Lai (Chinese for "come, come") Restaurant located in downtown Amherst which has ushered in a unique, varied cuisine.

The food has its roots in traditional Mandarin, Catonese and Schezuan specialties.

Yu is Tawianese and migrated to the United States when he was 11 years old. His father immediately opened a small restaurant in New York City, which provided this same cultural taste and introduced dishes not commonly available to Asian/Asian-Americans. At the age of 21, Yu stepped into his father shoes and opened up his own business in the more noticeable upper Manhattan section of New York. Yu (Fish) says he believes that he wanted to continue the tradition by offering the most tasteful and unique blend of dishes.

"Instead of copying what is in mainstream menus, I wanted to introduced a variety of dishes that reflect our rich cultural heritage," Fish said.

The Lai Lai restuarant opened on March 18, which is a significant day in the Chinese calendar year. The Year of the Rooster holds a special meaning and plays a role in how successful your business will be according to Chinese tradition. The 18th symbolizes the moon's positioning and its alignment in the stellar system and directly impacts the decision making for those embarking on a new venture.

"Our spiritual and cultural history indicates this was to be a day of good fortune and prosperity," said Fish.

Fish has also travelled across the country sampling various dishes, and says he believes that cooking is a very creative and one must be in tuned with its origin.

"I've selected the best dishes based upon my experience being a connoisseur of fine traditional dishes and I wanted to share these tastes with the Amherst community and offer the customer a more distinct menu," Fish said.

Fish has employed three chefs whose specialty reflect the diversity of dishes served. All members are considered a family and all shared the same vision when relocating to the Amherst area from New York.

"We've been in the business of preparing and serving the our food in the most traditional way all of our lives," Fish said.

The more notable dishes are the sauted sliced conch and the Sha Sha seafood casserole which is cooked in a bean curd base and served to the customer still cooking in a porcelain bowl. One might find even the most discriminating food lover appreciating the variety, tastes and smells offered by Lai Lai's experienced chefs.

As you walk by the restaurant you'll notice a bright yellow canopy and watch from the outside the window a chef engrossed in cooking and preparing dishes.

Fish says that coming to the Amherst area along with his family and staff was a compliment which is largely due to the great diversity he found.

"The climate along with the seasons made our job more challenging because the menu took a substantial amount of time to ensure freshness and the quality of food offered to our customers," Fish said.

"Freshness is utmost important in providing great tasting dishes."

dairy farm in an upstate New York town called Munnsville, along with their two elderly brothers, Lyman and Roscoe Ward.

The mystery revolves around Delbert's signed confession, even though he claims his innocence, and the eventual trial. Played out in a community that initially shunned the brothers but now embraces them, Brother's Keeper tells this engrossing story from the inside, resulting in an film that has well-earned its praise — winning Best Documentary from the National Society of Review, New York Film Critics Circle and Boston Society of Film Critics.

Sinofsky says it was both the Ward brothers' story and the filmmaker's idea of documentary that drew him to this subject.

"I've always been interested in present-tense filmmaking, the antithesis of the cinema-verite, talking-head type documentary," Sinofsky recalls. Both he and Berlinger have stated in other interviews that they question both classic documentary and its resistance to narrative structure as well as what Sinofsky and Berlinger believe to be its false sense of objectivity.

Sinofsky and Berlinger have admitted that despite the tag 'documentary,' Brother's Keeper is as much a construction of reality as a fiction film. In an interview with the Boston Globe, Berlinger said, "We are storytellers and not journalists," and that they "openly admit that this is our subjective impression of what happened."

With credit card debts mounting and a second mortgage taken out, Sinofsky and Berlinger continued their 50-60-hour-a-week jobs in New York at first, travelling up to Munnsville every weekend.

"We spent the first three to four weekends just getting to know them, gaining their trust," Sinofsky says, "We chewed tobacco, cleaned out the barn." It evidently worked, because by the end of the filmmaker's nine-month shoot, the brothers have named two turkeys after them.

Brother's Keeper follows the Ward brothers' story from Delbert's arrest to the ensuing media frenzy and tense trial. Along the way, the filmmakers capture essential conflicts over class structure and the justice system, all while providing intimate looks into the Ward brothers' lives. Even after the verdict is announced, questions linger. The film does not profess to have the final say on what happened in the case, and it may well bring up more questions that it answers. The success of Brother's Keeper, rather, lies in this absorbing, tightly woven narrative.

"The story is what guides the film," Sinofsky says. "It's about a different kind of family values, a story of an era gone by — a place where the clocks have stopped, of neighbors and of solidarity."

With the across the board acclaim the film received, Sinofsky and Berlinger have snagged a William Morris agent and are expected to have their next film in production by summer.

Sinofsky asserts his overnight success — 16 years in the making — has not gone to his head. "I've had the same confidence in me now as when I was at UMass," Sinofsky says.

Brother's Keeper opens tomorrow at the Amherst Cinema in downtwon Amherst. Joe Berlinger will be at the Friday and Saturday evening shows and available for questions.*

that.

The media is also skewed in the midst of the mystery. Keeper cuts somewhat frequently to taped news reports and often shows the television reporters practicing their spots, rehearsing every line. Connie Chung even gets into the act, anchoring a televised story on the Ward brothers that slides quickly into condescension as the brothers watch Chung's report. More than just media bashing, Sinofsky and Berlinger seem to be saying 'don't believe everything you see' — including their version.

The filmmakers invariably capture memorable characters and scenes along the way. There is Harry Thurston, a family friend who is the brothers' most vocal ally and a ridiculously anal medical examiner named Humphrey Don Germaniuk, both of whom deserve documentaries of their own.

There is a party scene, where Delbert, Lyman and Roscoe Ward dance for the first time, and an ending that recalls more than one conclusion to a fiction film.

Throughout the film, Sinofsky and Berlinger refrain from outright comment on Delbert's guilt or innocence, though they certainly make him out to be both a victim of an urban society and a hero of a simpler, more honest time-gone-by. Sequences where Delbert says he farms because he "likes the smell of the hay" seem to epitomize the aw-shucks innocence country life. But they are mirrored with very real images of true farm existence. The most disturbing scene for me comes when a farm hand kills a pig and then begins dismembering and cutting it open. "Green Acres," this ain't.

After the verdict is announced, a secret which the filmmakers don't want critics to reveal, questions linger. Justice may be done or not and truth is in the eye of the beholder. Brother's Keeper proves once again that truth is stranger than fiction — and ultimately more interesting. A-raft-mate who is subjected to a shocking whipping and hanging. Welcome to adult Disney, boys and girls.

If you can bear the simplistic, oft-repeated morals of the movie, (Lying is bad. Racial tolerance is good.) there is a lot to be reaped from this version of Huck Finn. The friendship between Jim and Huck is a heartwarming big brother/little brother relationship which is careful to recreate the slavery system of the time without making Huck a "master" over Jim.

Other impressive performances were turned out by Robbie Coltrane and Jason Robards playing the "royalty" in the story who attempt to impersonate two brothers, a British priest and his mute brother, in order to inherit a fortune — at the expense of three beautiful, unbelievably decked-out heiresses. The littlest heiress is a bigger threat than Sherlock Holmes ever was.

Maybe Huck saves the day — maybe not. I won't give "it" away, and I'll encourage you to see this stunning performance by Wood who effectively renders the complexities of both the transition from childhood to manhood and friendship. To blatantly steal from the movie poster, The Adventures of Huck Finn is for "anyone who has ever dreamed of running away from it all." B+ the breakup. . .)

8. "Play With Fire" — Rolling Stones You know that Mick and the boys have an idea or two about relationships. A quiet song but also very evil sounding.

7. "Go Your Own Way" — Fleetwood Mac This classic rock anthem is another great song for those stuck in denial. Super to sing to while driving very fast on twisted roads.

6. "Love Will Tear Us Apart" — Joy Division Joy Division can make anyone feel better, because you realize that no one is as depressed as them. Extra angst is added to the song when you know that lead singer Ian Curtis hung himself after he recorded it. Ouch.

5. "Last Day of Our Acquaintance" — Sinead O'Connor She has more anger in that small, bald, Irish body of hers than anyone in music. If you have a live version of this song, where she swears as much as possible throughout, it makes you feel even better.

4. "Used to Love Her" — Guns 'n' Roses Any song about Axl killing his girlfriend and burying her in his backyard has got to help you put things in perspective. ("Heck, at least I'm not homicidal. . .")

3. "Love Stinks" — J. Geils Band I think everyone, at some point in their lives, has been intoxicated with a group of friends and sang this song at the top of their lungs. Feels pretty good, doesn't it? Such true lyrics, too.

2. "Add It Up" — Violent Femmes Most people cannot sing, but neither can the lead singer of this band, so you feel okay screeching and yelping your way through every word of this twisted, angst-ridden alternative classic. Ask yourself, "Why can't I get just one. . ." Well, you know the words.

1."Something I Can Never Have" — Nine Inch Nails Any song by this group would be appropriate. You may not know this song, but you'll have to trust me when I tell you that it is the most evil, dark, and just plain screwed up song that I have ever heard. I've heard it a million times, and it still gives me shivers, especially when lead singer/sicko Trent Renzor sings lines like, "Grey would be the color if I had a heart. . ." Whiew. A must for anyone feeling bitter about a relationship.

That is it. I feel better even having written about them. Hopefully they can help you through a tough time, too, on your way to that compost pile this spring. Special thanks to my roomate, who helped compile this list, and to whom the Nine Inch Nails song is known simply as "number five."

State cuts funding from rain research

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

The state recently cut funding from the Acid Rain Monitoring project, a University of Massachusetts based research group that was started in 1983 and has surveyed 81 percent of the state's surface water.

The project, which is under the direction of the University of Massachusetts Water Resources Center, was started in 1985 as a 10-year program to study the changes in acidity in 750 of Massachusetts' lakes and streams four times a year.

Director Paul Godfrey said the program is unique because it relies on volunteers to gather water samples. He said the use of volunteers allows research to be done at a fraction of what it would otherwise cost.

Godfrey said in the second year of the program, the volunteers collected data from 2,500 lakes and streams, twice, at a cost of $330,000 while the Environmental Protection Agency spent $12 million to survey 2,000 lakes in eastern Massachusetts.

To get accurate statistics the program must run for ten years, Godfrey said. He said the lack of state funding will cause the program to be shut down two years from completion, making the previous years a waste of time and money.

"Unless we are able to complete the last two years, the work of hundreds of volunteers over the past eight years will have been for naught," Godfrey said.

The Division of Fisheries and Wildlife funded the program at one time, but in 1988 the Inland Fish and Game Division took on the expenses.

The Inland Fish and Game Division is supported by revenue collected from the sale of hunting and fishing licenses. Due to an increase in state health benefits and salaries, they no longer have the budget to support the project.

Godfrey said the most feasible option would be to return to the original manner of funding the program. He said the program will help in finding statistics for the federal government's $5 billion Clean Air Act.

A year's operating costs are about $700,000, of which the University contributes $500,000, Godfrey said. He said the University will continue to fund the program.

The project is trying to get the $240,000 usually contributed by the state government. Godfrey said he hopes the state will set aside appropriations for the program.

"There is a long process before the state budget is signed, sealed and delivered," Godfrey said. "There are hopeful signs, but we still have a long way to go."

State Senator Stanley Rosenberg said he has asked for a meeting with the new secretary to discuss the program's fate.

"It has been a continuous battle to keep that program afloat," Rosenberg said. "We are going to do what we can to keep this program going."

Rosenberg said as a representative he fought to maintain funding for the program, and that it is hard to predict whether the program will receive funds from the state.

Lawyers give last remarks in King trial

By LINDA DEUTSCH
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Rodney King was beaten and kicked by police officers who wanted to teach him a lesson even though he posed no threat as he lay helplessly on the ground, a prosecutor said today in closing arguments.

"Is this the way you want police officers to behave? Is this the way you want police officers to treat citizens in this country?" Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven Clymer asked the jury in the highly charged civil rights case.

Clymer, summing up the government's case against four policemen, showed the jury the infamous video of policemen beating King and asserted the last 50 seconds shows the defendants violating King's civil rights.

He said defendants Laurence Powell and Timothy Wind clubbed King while he was defenseless, that Theodore Briseno stomped on King while he tried to comply with officers' orders and that Stacey Koon, the sergeant in charge at the scene, did nothing to stop the abuse.

The prosecutor acknowledged that before the March 3, 1991, beating King had been drunk and disrespectful and initially resisted being handcuffed. But Clymer said King didn't deserve the beating.

"These defendants taught Rodney King a lesson," said Clymer. "They went far beyond what was. . . necessary to arrest Rodney King.

He said that after the beating, instead of collecting eyewitness accounts or other evidence, the defendants "stood around with other police officers who were looking and laughing."

He called the defense case an "exaggeration that

Commemorative march planned

Rally to celebrate Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s work

By JONATHAN MOORE
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Calling for a renewed commitment to end the "violence of racism and poverty," Coretta Scott King and fellow civil rights leaders announced plans Thursday for a 30th anniversary March on Washington.

"The critical issues that faced us in 1963 are unfortunately still with us today," said Mrs. King, the widow of Martin Luther King Jr. "We cannot give up, or give out, if we are to fulfill Dr. King's dream, and our dream, of a better America."

The march would commemorate the historic rally led by Dr. King that concluded with his "I have a dream" speech before about 250,000 demonstrators at the Lincoln Memorial.

Mrs. King said "hundreds of thousands" are expected at the Washington Monument on Aug. 28. The twentieth anniversary of the 1963 march drew 300,000.

Joseph L. Lowery, president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, the group founded by King, said the theme of the 1993 march is "jobs and justice."

"The violence of joblessness is a contributing factor to the despair and desperation that often leads to violent responses," Lowery said.

Lowery credited the civil rights movement with many achievements, but said serious inequalities still remain for Blacks and other minorities.

March organizers said their coalition includes over

University holds forum on abuse

By VANESSA ADELMAN
Collegian Staff

The Office of Human Relations held a forum yesterday in the wake of the death of Tara Harnett to address questions from students, faculty and staff about what constitutes relationship violence, how the campus responds to it and what resources are available.

The forum was attended by representatives of key University offices and agencies, as well as by Sandra Staub, the Assistant District Attorney.

According to Bob Thrasher, Director of Public Safety, the legal definition of abuse is causing, threatening or putting someone else in fear of abuse. Thrasher said it becomes domestic or relationship abuse when a person abuses someone who is a part of their family, a friend, a household member or someone with whom they have a relationship.

"For anyone being abused by someone else, 'domestic' includes the residence halls," Thrasher said. "So if anyone, whether it be a student or anyone else, needed a restraining order for domestic abuse, they could obtain one."

Staub said she gets many calls about people having "bad feelings" toward another person that has not yet reached the stage of bodily harm. In this case, she said, the person cannot get a restraining order, but she refers them to other resources that will help that person.

"Abuse doesn't just have to be in the physical sense," said Carol Wallace, a representative from the Everywoman's Center. "It can include emotional or psychological."

Correction

The Student Government Association amendment described in Thursday's issue of the Collegian was incorrectly stated. The article said the amendment would make it legal for students to sue the University. This is incorrect. The amendment will not allow students to sue the University. The Collegian regrets the error.

The tuition hike of $864 a year which was printed in Thursday's issue of the Collegian was also incorrectly stated. The actual figure will be $432 a year. The Collegian regrets the error.

Funk-o-thon tickets now on sale

By DENISE TRUCHLY
Special to the Collegian

The Black Mass Communication Project will be sponsoring its 14th annual Funk-o-thon Saturday, April 23, at 10:30 p.m.

The dance party will be held at the Student Union Ballroom, with tickets to go on sale April 5 at the Fine Arts Center Ticket Office. Tickets bought in advance for $6 can be charged or payed by check or cash. There will also be tickets sold for $8 the day of the event, until 8:00 p.m.

The BMCP All-Stars, which includes P-nut Daly, O-H-I Slector and "Jon Jack," will be spinning at this year's event.

Due to the problems experienced last year, BMCP has made plans to alleviate crowd problems. Organizers said they hope early ticket sales will cut down on the size of the crowd waiting to buy tickets. There will a six-ticket limit per person and a valid college ID is required. Also, if by any reason the party should be stopped, there will be no refunds.

As always, BMCP is stressing the importance of people coming to party peacefully.

"We want people to have fun and also be safe," explained Jonathan Jackson, business manager of BMCP. "We want to mutually make it safe for our patrons."

Jackson added that there have been plans set up with University police and heads of the Campus Center.

The BMCP is asking for willing male and female students to be security at the Funk-o-thon. If the quota for security is not reached, the dance party will not be held. For students interested, please call the BMCP office for more information, 545-2426.

Established in 1969, the BMCP is one of the oldest and largest organizations at the University. BMCP was organized to give people practical experience in diversified communications, radio and television.

Marky settles suit out of court

BOSTON (AP) — Music star Marky Mark, who was charged with kicking a man in the face and breaking his jaw, avoided a criminal trial Monday when he settled a civil suit with his accuser.

Amy Machtum, a Suffolk County assistant district attorney, asked that the assault charges be dismissed because the victim didn't want to pursue the case any further.

Judge Robert Ziemian agreed to dismiss the charges after the victim, Robert D. Crehan, said he was satisfied with the outcome.

Marky Mark, the stage name for Mark Wahlberg, was to face a criminal trial Monday. He arrived in court, where some of his fans were waiting, but Crehan's attorney announced the settlement before the proceedings began.

Crehan claimed that Wahlberg kicked him while another man held him down last Aug. 30.

The other man, Derek McCall, was also charged, but the case against him was dismissed Monday as part of the settlement.

Marc Breakstone, the victim's lawyer, said his client received a financial settlement, but declined to specify how much money was involved.

"We are satisfied that Mr. Crehan has been compensated fairly and therefore we have decided to drop the civil matter," Breakstone said.

Wahlberg made no comment when he appeared in court. His attorney, Oliver Mitchell, insisted the fight began when another person who was with Mr. Crehan directed a racial slur at McCall, who is black.

"Mark absolutely maintains that he was not responsible for the incident," Mitchell said.

Explaining the reason for settling the case, Mitchell said: "Mark made a business decision given the risks associated with any litigation."

Crehan stood by his original claims, according to Breakstone, who added that "criminal charges should have been pursued but were not because the issue was resolved for Mr. Crehan."

Crehan said he was happy with the settlement but wouldn't discuss its terms.

Wahlberg, who is popular with young music fans, has received further exposure modeling Calvin Klein underwear in advertisements. He is the brother of Donnie Wahlberg of New Kids on the Block.

Mark Wahlberg, however, also has been the source of other controversy. Earlier this year, activist groups criticized him, saying he has demonstrated bigoted behavior.

Wahlberg apologized, admitting he used racist language when he harassed a group of black students in 1986 and when he assaulted two Vietnamese men in 1988.

200 civil rights, women's, labor and other groups. In the past, the event has included a speech at the Washington Monument, then a march to the Capitol, than down Constitution Avenue to the Lincoln Memorial.

Mrs. King said this year's event could include entertainment in addition to the usual speeches.

Board of Governors elects chairs

Incumbent Gordon withdraws nomination for top post

By DANIEL BOUCHER
Collegian Staff

The Board of Governors last night elected Jennifer Griffith as vice-chair, and voted George Fitzgerald unanimously to the position of chair after Fitzgerald's opponent for the position, Dan Gordon, withdrew his nomination.

Fitzgerald said he hoped to use his "extensive contacts" with registered student organizations such as the Board of Governors, the University Democrats, the Republican Club and MassPIRG.

Fitzgerald was president of the University Democrats, but said he would give up his position to become the board's chair.

"We're here to serve the students," said Fitzgerald.

Dan Gordon told the board he decided to relax his commitments to the board and "enjoy my last year at UMass."

"I'm really sorry he dropped out of contention," said Fitzgerald, and said he would have been a good chair. Citing Gordon's position as chair of the Food Service committee, he confirmed Gordon had an extensive commitment to the board.

Jen Griffith said she wanted to make the board known for more than passing out office space and assigning places for tables on the concourse. She also said she wanted to make the board less isolated from other student organizations.

Griffith also said, outside the meeting, she would like to reinstate comedy nights, but nothing has been settled upon yet.

Bill Harris, the director of the Campus Center, said the comedy nights cost the Hatch between $600 and $800 a night, and between 300 and 400 students usually attended them.

Harris said the comedy nights were discontinued because a student in charge of the programming council left the job last semester for personal reasons and no one was available to replace her.

Multicultural Seder elicits understanding

By LISA GREENFIELD
Collegian Correspondent

Approximately 60 people joined together to celebrate freedom and remember the pain of oppression, during the Multicultural Passover Seder on Wednesday night in room 174 of the Campus Center.

The Seder was funded by the Student Government and organized by the Cape Verdean Student Alliance and the Black-Jewish Relations Committee with help from the Chabbad House.

Mingled with the usual Passover customs, people read poems about the afflictions of different cultures in relation to the meaning of Passover.

A woman, who wished to remain unidentified, made a speech that many said was eloquent and touching. She said she was gratified by the enthusiastic turnout at the Seder.

"If any one of us is not free, than none of us are free. . .If we do not stand up for one another, we will be forced to walk down the same painful road together," she said.

Marci Melzer, a sophomore, said she was touched by the woman's sentiments.

"That woman's speech really made me feel good. It made me smile because she made me feel closer to other people," Melzer said.

Recurrent themes of the night were unity and understanding. Steve Sparling and Dan Henderson from the Black-Jewish Relations Committee and two of the leaders of the Seder, emphasized the enthusiasm of the participants.

The groups, "are allowed to disagree, but have great similarities. . .When asked to share their cultures, everyone is enthusiastic to be involved," said Sparling.

Henderson talked about the conscious effort of individuals to reach out, and how important that is in creating an understanding of cultures different from one's own.

The president of the Cape Verdean Student Alliance, Adonis, helped to select poems from the anthology of Cape Verdean artists, "Across the Atlantic."

He said he found it encouraging that his group was able to share in this experience and considered it a "breakthrough, as a way to bring out [his] group and share the meaning of Passover and educate others about Cape Verdean culture."

Also, he said he was touched by the fact that Rabbi

Men's group is formed

Violence and other issues are targeted

By JOY COLLINS
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts campus lacks a place for men to talk with other men about their personal issues or issues such as violence against women, sexism, racism or homophobia, said the organizer of a new men's group on campus called "Men Acting for Change."

Brian Oats, a Bachelor's Degree with Individual Concentration in gender studies major, had done an internship at the Men's Resource Center, an Amherst men's organization dedicated to stopping violence against women and encouraging discussion among men about issues that affect them, and decided to organize a similar program at UMass.

Oats said men need somewhere to talk about their issues and he feels it is important for men to work not only on personal issues, but on women's issues as well.

"Men need to take the initiative to fight issues like violence against women," he said. "Men need to get involved too."

John Hipsher, a Social Thought and Political Economy major, said the group gives him an opportunity to create bonds and to share his experiences and similarities with other men.

"There's a lot of pressure in society to be a certain way. We were not born this way; we were conditioned to be the way we are," Hipsher said. "I think we are here to try to break down some of those barriers, just to be human."

Danny Jokelson, a recent University graduate, said he felt that the majority of men are ignorant about their role in the system of oppression and are caught up in the mainstream.

He also said even when men do find out they are part of the system of oppression, they don't have anywhere to talk about it and tend to feel very guilty.

"I think it is important for men to have a place they can come to if they feel differently from their friends or do not have the support of those around them," Jokelson said.

Russ Gees, a BDIC major, said he had been in a similar group in Cambridge, Mass., and that "he really missed it" when he moved to this area.

"It was a really good group. We got to know each other really well and always looked forward to our meeting each week," Gees said. "I vowed that I would get involved in a men's group here."

Jokelson said the group spends time talking about their individual or political issues and how they are affected by them personally, as well as focusing on activism.

"I would like us to be some kind of force in this university toward social change, but not in any kind of way that is dominating," he said. "We just want to be an assisting force, to be supportive and political."

Oats said the group would like to organize a men's rally protesting violence against women and to campaign against rape, racism and homophobia.

"We are a group that does not discriminate on the basis of race, gender or sex, but we are targeting men," Hipsher said.

Oats said although the group so far is primarily White, they are very open to anyone who subscribes to the group's goals and would very much like to have people of other races.

"It is a necessity if you are trying to attack issues that have so many sides," Jokelson said. "You need to get everybody's

Prof. tells of apartheid

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

South African native and University of Massachusetts School of Management Professor Mzamo Mangaliso spoke to a group of students and professors about his experiences with apartheid in South Africa last night.

Mangaliso, who received his masters degree at Cornell University and his doctorate at UMass, said when he came to America he sought to learn about the history of South Africa and how the apartheid government has been able to stay in power.

"When I was growing up in South Africa there were several things I didn't hear. I was always taught the White history of South Africa," Mangaliso said. "When I came to the United States I researched why things are the way they are in South Africa — how 25 million can control five million, why we can't vote, why we have to pay for school."

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN
Professor Mzamo Mangaliso

Mangaliso said he has been asked repeatedly how the apartheid government is able to dominate 25 million people. He said historically one of the reasons Whites have remained in control is their use of trickery.

Mangaliso then told the story of British missionary Sir George Grey. Grey studied the ancestor worship of the South African ethnic group Xhosa. In 1857, he was able to convince a young girl to tell her father that if all of the group's crops were burned and its cattle slaughtered, their ancestors would rise from the dead in three days. After the Xhosa did as they were advised, they suffered from starvation and were reduced to begging from the White farmers.

Mangaliso then discussed the role of multinational corporations in South Africa. He said companies such as General Motors and Ford have been in South Africa since 1908 and since then 6,000 United States companies have been in South Africa. Mangaliso said by 1975, United States direct investments in South Africa had risen to $2 billion.

Mangaliso said because of the "slave wages" paid to workers in South Africa, corporations are able to receive as much as an 11 percent higher rate of return on their investments than they could achieve anywhere else in the world.

"In 1970 I worked in a gold mine in the Orange Free State," he said. "A

Saul Perlmutter commented to him about the selection of poetry, because it indicated to him an open-minded appreciation of his culture.

Two officers of the Asian American Student Association, Willie Tang and Paul Gee, said they were very impressed with their first Seder.

Gee said, "It felt good to hear other voices chanting in unity." Tang pointed out the importance of everyone coming together.

In addition to the groups present, it was acknowledged that many others also suffer oppression from homophobia, sexism, addiction and other personal and economic problems.

"Everyone must, at some point overcome the oppression of their souls and spirits in the struggle for hope," one woman said.

Another said there is a need to not "look at the oppression of the others as abstract, but to internalize the pain, whether we are personally afflicted or not."

Rabbi Saul Perlmutter asked, "Why is this night different from any other night?" He answered, "...because all of us have come to see how intertwined we all are. We see a reflection of each other in each other's eyes."

He told a story about the wise child, a symbolic part of the Passover Seder. He said questions lead to wisdom and on the night of the Seder all were wise children.

The multicultural Seder was aimed at bringing the message of unity and understanding towards others, fostering cooperation in the face of oppression and bringing hope in times of suffering.

input."

Oats said the group's objectives include raising consciousness about gender issues and creating a positive environment for men to discuss issues related to their gender roles.

He said their goals are also to question and challenge traditional, confining gender roles, to take action against oppression and to educate campus men on the various forms of oppression.

"I think there is going to be some sensitivity to the fact that we are a men's group working on our issues, talking about violence against women, homophobia, racism and sexism," Oats said.

"It is possible that [criticism] is going to be directed at us. People will ask why we are doing this, why are we here, and the reason is that if men do not do anything then we are not going to get anywhere with these issues."

The closing arguments began a day after a court session in which jury instructions on the meaning of unreasonable force and intent were thrashed out by the judge and lawyers.

Uptown bar's drunken patrons disturb elderly residents

On some beautiful spring day, when you blow off your classes to visit the Emily Dickinson Homestead on Main Street, there'll be a beautiful yellow house about a mile up on the left that you may want to stop at.

It has as much historical significance, if not more, than the Dickinson House. You may know it as Twisters Tavern.

This establishment is a popular bar for college-aged kids. It is popular despite the fact that the business is bankrupt, and is responsible for literally tearing the town of Amherst apart.

It is popular despite the fact that it is about 200 feet from an elderly apartment complex. It is popular despite the fact that time and time again, its patrons have acted somewhat foolis after an evening of adult beverages at Twisters.

The general path of destruction usually starts behind Twisters, in the bushes, where patrons use the shrubbery as a backup toilet. After all, it was smart planning to install bathrooms outside because there sure aren't enough inside.

On a typical night, most in a drunken stupor do not walk up Main Street because the police station is practically across from Twisters. Instead, the inebriated individuals head to Antonio's Pizza for a brief respite before walking down North Pleasant Street screaming, "Hey baby, my jimmy runs deee!" After unsuccessfully attempting to drink at other uptown bars, these young people stagger home.

And that's just on Tuesday nights.

Luckily, there are some people who are not afraid of the owners and supporters of Twisters. They are the elderly who live in Clark House Apartments. Most of these people are wise beyond their years, and one of their biggest concerns at this stage of their lives is getting a quiet, peaceful night of sleep. For years now, Twisters has prevented that.

"Don't run a picture of me," Margot Parrot tells us over the phone. "I've been threatened, people have called me."

Michael
MORRISSEY

Ms. Parrot is a dangerous person. She has fought against a popular hangout, its owner, its supporters (including UMass coach John Calipari, who sends his team to eat there before games) and its sale. She is dangerous because she is winning the fight, and she's not about to stop now.

"I don't blame Mark Forsyth [Twisters' owner]," Parrot said. "I don't think any new management can control some of the things that go on on the premises, because they don't have the power to arrest people."

Isn't that the job of the police department, which rests about 400 feet away?

"Twisters shares the house with Pinocchio's restaurant, and there's a different clientele there. They have different hours, and stop serving drinks earlier. I don't think there have ever been any problems; I have not observed it."

Although the law has been broken by overcrowding the tavern on two occasions, Twisters continues to operate. Although it is a source of noise pollution in the town, the police let the good times roll.

The Amherst Zoning Board is one of the only groups to stand up to Twisters. The board will not allow the license to be transferred to a new owner, and they will not increase the capacity either. Instead, Parrot said she thinks the capacity will be shrunk in the near future.

"My gut feeling is that they won't be allowed 120 [person capacity]," she said. "The only reason they have now is because of a temporary restraining order."

"Actually, what the town needs most is a grocery store," she answered when asked what she would turn Twisters into. "There used to be one in Boltwood Walk that many people frequented."

The house that holds Twisters looks more like a tea house than a tavern, but it will probably never be turned into a grocery store, a bingo hall or a place for fortune telling. It will not because there are too many college drunks ready to throw a cinder block through Clark House Apartments, threaten the elderly, and raise a riot if their playpen is closed.

They ask the elderly if they have anything better to do besides spy in bushes. We ask them if they have anything better to do than get drunk in Twisters, urinate in a bush and pass out.

No? Didn't think so.

Why are the steps so quiet?

I sat on the Student Union Steps one of these past sunny days and listened. . . and just heard the sound of feet and bike wheels. It was alarmingly quiet.

The PC police have blasted through and left a smooth residue in the consciousness of everyone who ever began a sentence with, "I think. . ." Believe it.

Chancellor O'Brien and the administration have repeatedly acted too damn slow at responding to racial hostility on campus.

Gary
DEANE

I'm sitting here wondering what it is that makes UMass a "liberal" school. Hmmm. When I was a freshman I thought it was cool that there was a Gay Pride Day, only to be followed by a Straight Pride Day. So long as nobody is bothering anyone else, I thought it was a great idea that these people were marching around and speaking out. I didn't stop to participate in either, but at least everyone was discussing campus issues. Before you knew it, that was all banned by the administration.

The officers in the Rodney King beating trial are getting tried twice for the same crime.

There was a time when students gathered together to protest the rising cost of higher education. They petitioned and protested and wrote letters everywhere and even stamped on some flowers. I think that did a great deal of good.

It was much better than the second-rate takeover of Memorial Hall to protest the celebration of Columbus Day.

The Mullins Center is a huge flop, and I miss the barns.

In some of the dorms recently I've noticed huge murals expounding the results of a survey. Ninety percent of the residents felt safe in their dorm. Eighty-three percent are happy with the alcohol policy. I bet 85 percent think it's fair to get written up for carrying a glass of milk out of their rooms, too.

A great many of the people who hang out at the S.U.B. steps are a bunch of phoneys and posers.

It doesn't take a degree to figure out the people most dissatisfied with the dorms don't show for the floor meetings or fill out questionnaires. Maybe they should, and drive those statistics down to 25 percent. The alcohol policy is a joke, the heating system is outdated, the kitchens are locked away, but we'd be pleased to fix your window at say, 8 a.m. We'll knock first.

At least people are beginning to attend the Housing review forums, after absolutely no one showed for the first one. I left the dorms long ago, so you are on your own.

The library should be open 24 hours a day before we get a skating rink, before we plant more trees and before we offer cable TV in the dorms.

We voted on the "Hemp Initiative" this semester. Those in favor of it had tables and rallies and informational talks. Those against it were too scared to speak up, afraid to look like an outcast at such a liberal, doped up school. Pot 1977, no pot 893. Nobody was brave enough to hold an "anti-pot" rally so we get the press we deserve. Now people complain they've been asked about this at job interviews.

Maybe it's just been the cold winter, but now that the warm weather is here, feel free to go out and make some noise.

Illogical racism, 'low standards'

Michael Morrissey's "Low Standards" (pardon the pun) points to the fact that racism is alive, well and breeding on this campus [Collegian, April 2]. Morrissey's incredible connection of minority admission issues to rape, maiming and killing is an excellent piece of racist sophistry.

According to Morrissey, lowering admission standards (or allowing more people of color on campus) would mean an increase in murder and rape. Q.E.D.: All people of color are dangerous. This would lead me to believe that Jeffrey Dahmer, in fact, painted himself white or that all White people on campus are secretly growing wings and halos.

I do hope we get "brighter and better" students than Michael Morrissey who, incidentally, should really spend more time learning how to write. I would like to point out that the following sentence — "It is ironic that while University President Michael Hooker looks at the university system of California as the system to aspire to, Mitchell-Kernan has almost two decades of experience at UCLA" — bears witness to an illogical mind.

Michael, in the future, please make sure you are more careful about the logical progression of ideas in your writing.

Columnist wrongly accused YAF

I am writing in response to Nathan Crick's article [Collegian, April 7]. First of all I would like to make it clear that I am the chairman of those "slobs" from Young Americans for Freedom. I have been the president of YAF since the fall and have never before known Mr. Crick but I find his comments rude and totally misplaced.

I find it even more disturbing that Mr. Crick dispenses with any explanation of his verbal assault by saying, "I don't think I have to explain why." Well, Mr. Crick, I think you do need to explain why. I challenge you or anyone with the same opinions to stop by the YAF office at 308 Student Union so we can address your grievances in a intelligent dialogue.

As for your charges of racism, I would like to make it clear that YAF in no way attempts to expound racist ideology. However, I and the YAF membership have had to suffer through both physical and verbal assaults.

I constantly receive harassing, vulgar and physically threatening mail and phone calls at both my home and office. I have had rocks, snowballs and even a burning cigarette thrown at me when I was only walking across campus.

I have had people vandalize my car, steal and deface my personal property, and make me afraid to walk across campus alone. The bulletin board in front of our office is constantly trashed, ripped down and defaced. On one occasion we had someone even dump urine under our office door.

Yet do you know what I do, Mr. Crick, every time someone threatens my life or trashes my stuff? I pray for them. My God tells me that I am supposed to love everyone and I try hard to do that. I'm not perfect, no one is, but I am trying. It is not easy to turn the other cheek and I wish I could do a better job, but I have never committed nor advocated an act of violence against anyone because of their race or beliefs. I've volunteered at soup kitchens, shelters for homeless and abused women and I've sponsored poor children in Africa.

I may not agree with the liberal ideas about how to solve racism but I do agree that it is a major problem. I would remind you that my ideas are very similar to such prominent African-Americans as Clarence Thomas and Alan Keyes.

So I would suggest, Mr. Crick, that in the future if you want to criticize an organization for standing up for what they believe in, you first at least find out what they really believe. On a personal note, I do look forward to meeting you and please know that I am praying for you.

The gifts Greeks bear: no cause for a scare

By ROBERT FITZGERALD
Collegian Correspondent

The members of the Greek Area would like to welcome interested people to the area.

The Greek Area is the largest Registered Student Organization on campus, with approximately 1200 men and women actively involved.

Where are the 1200 people? They are everywhere. They are in classes, dorms and the D.C. There are 24 recognized fraternity and sorority chapters on campus. Of those 24 chapters, nine of them are sororities and 15 of them are fraternities. Each of those 1200 people has chosen to become affiliated with one of these chapters.

Every chapter is different and has its own beliefs and standards that each member strives to live by. Being in the Greek Area is like being in any on-campus area. Looking from afar, the area appears to be homogenous, but on closer inspection the diversity of the group becomes apparent.

"What do you do?" is probably the most commonly asked question to someone involved in the Greek Area. Each chapter is involved with projects throughout the year to help better the local community.

Something else Greeks concentrate on is academics. As a group, Greeks are "planners" and "future lookers." Members plan on being the future leaders of the American and world communities. There is a strong need for strong educational backgrounds, and the main reason to be in college is to get that.

What about parties? Yes, the Greek Area does have parties. They are just like any other off-campus party, except that there might be more people. There is more space than at most parties and there might be more people, but there are 1200 Greeks.

Sigma Phi Epsilon is having a Battle of the Bands. A part of the proceeds from the tickets that are sold will go to benefit a local charity. Greek Week starts Sunday, April 25.

Researchers find gene

Breakthrough in 'bubble boy' disease

By DANIEL HANEY
Associated Press

BOSTON — Genetic material from a boy who died after spending his entire life in a protective bubble has helped scientists find the gene that caused his rare disease which robs the body of all defenses.

Researchers estimate that this gene accounts for about half of all cases of severe combined immune deficiency disease, or SCID, which occurs in about one in every 100,000 births.

The discovery is the latest in a rapid series of breakthroughs into the genetic underpinnings of illnesses. Scientists in recent weeks have reported pinpointing the genes that cause as diverse ailments as Huntington's disease and attention deficit disorder.

Experts believe many common disorders, such as heart disease and cancer, result from a complex interplay between several inherited genes and outside influences, such as diet and other exposures.

However, other, usually much rarer, disorders apparently stem from a single miscue in just one gene.

This was the case in X-linked SCID, a form of the immune deficiency that is passed from mothers to sons. Researchers from the National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute in Bethseda, Md., reported their discovery in the latest issue of the journal Cell, published in Cambridge, Mass.

The scientists based their work on genetic material taken from three SCID patients. One of them was David, the best-known victim of the disease.

The youngster, whose last name was never revealed, lived in plastic bubbles to protect him from germs. Like other victims, his body lacked the key disease-fighting blood cells called T cells, and he was defenseless against common microbes.

The only cure for SCID is bone marrow transplant, which can furnish the body with normal blood. David died in Houston in 1984 at age 12 of blood cancer resulting from a virus he caught when he received marrow from his sister.

Like the other recent genetic discoveries, this one offers no immediate prospect of curing the underlying disease.

"The key is we are now pointed in the clear direction of how to achieve that," said Dr. Warren Leonard, senior author of the report.

In this case, it may be possible to someday cure SCID with gene therapy. The strategy would be to remove blood-forming tissue called stem cells, insert good copies of the defective gene and then put them back into the victims' bodies.

According to Wallace, intervention must take place before the violence happens with resources such as the ones offered by the Everywoman's Center. Wallace said the center cannot keep up with the calls or the requests for workshops. The center is run by volunteers so they are not always as quick as a professional organization, but they do offer a 24-hour hot line, short-term counseling and legal and medical advocacy.

"The law is narrower than the abuse," she said. "The victim must know that it is not acceptable, that it is abuse, and once they recognize that, we must help them deal with it and not internalize it."

According to Thrasher, most of the victims are women, but there are male victims and neither of these are exclusively in heterosexual relationships. Thrasher said he deals with this kind of violence more regularly than the public is aware of — almost on a nightly basis.

Representatives from other campus organizations also presented the resources they offer for domestic violence. University Health Services offers referrals and short-term counseling. Other departments where victims can obtain help and support include the Employee Assistance Program, Residential Life and the Dean's Office.

Silly Indecent Proposal: don't even ask

Lame script, dumb plot make film one of the year's worst

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

There is truly something indecent about Adrian Lyne's Indecent Proposal, but it's not the subject matter — a billionaire offers a couple $1 million for one night with the wife — but how jaw droppingly silly it is. This is the kind of movie where costumes are more detailed than the script and the production design more three dimensional than the characters. Proposal doesn't even have actors, really, more like star auras posturing in expensive outfits. This is high-concept melodrama that turns quickly to camp.

Everything about Proposal is arty and conspicuously fake. The ridiculous story starts off intriguing enough — a lurid morality tale — but ends up a gushy, romantic fable. The film is so shaky and outlandish that it can't even defend itself; it becomes a big joke long before it makes its dim-witted point, if indeed it has a point at all.

Lyne, who concocted everybody's favorite soft porn fest, 9 1/2 Weeks and invented the 'from hell' genre with Fatal Attraction has taken another hot button topic and, for the first time, has run it into the ground with seemingly relentless stupidity.

David (Woody Harrelson) and Diana (Demi Moore) are a couple who go to Las Vegas in a last ditch effort to gamble their way out of their financial woes. They lose their money, but gain the attention of billionaire businessman John Gage (Robert Redford). Gage proposes the deal — one million bucks for one night with Diana. She eventually agrees (she soul searches for over a night's sleep at least), uttering one of the film's many stupid lines: "It's just my body, David. Not my mind, my heart." Oh, okay.

After the deed is done, the couple return home. David's jealousy and guilt, not to mention Diana's claim that sex with John was "very good," lead to a breakup. This is where the film goes bonkers. As fast as you can shake your head in disbelief, John's back in the picture again and wooing the receptive Diana. It all ends on a decidedly lame twist, the nail in the coffin as it were to the film's believability.

The biggest, but certainly not the only problem with Proposal, revolves around the clueless screenplay by Amy Holden Jones (who also penned Slumber Party Massacre — and it shows) scripts the film like the bad soap opera it becomes, especially lame voice-overs that haunt the movie. Lines like "The weeks without David felt like months" and "I decided to teach citizenship to keep myself busy" are said with such an earnest shallowness that it's hard not to laugh.

The characters themselves seem to exist only in some sort of glossy movie world. This is a problem both with character credibility and sympathy. Here are these three people — a man who offers money for sex, a wife who agrees and a husband who allows but then gets jealous — and director Lyne manages to make their motivations so achingly trite so that by the end of the movie, all three are redeemed. The husband is now repentant, the wife sure about who she loves, the billionaire a tragic anti-hero. For all of Lyne's talk of exploring adult and controversial themes, the transparent characters and unbelievable twists left me struggling to find a point in a film that didn't really say anything beyond, "you can't buy love." In Honeymoon in Vegas, with which Proposal shares more than one similarity, it did the same thing but at least that was entertaining.

Proposal is one of those serious movies that has a sense of humor, but throws it at us at the strangest times. This could make a funny movie — and it did with Honeymoon in Vegas — but the comedy is way out of place in a movie that pretends to be about something.

As for the performances, Demi Moore was engaging, but then again so were her breasts. They should be nominated for Best Supporting Performance. Her role is probably the toughest, because she's being bought and sold and must still hold on to her dignity. She does, but it's more of her desperate attempt to gain some footage in the sinking ship that is Proposal and less a declaration of independence. At least Sharon Stone in Basic Instinct provided a solid, no, immovable center to the film. Moore's too busy posing in straw hats and skimpy dresses, revealing her breasts as if to say, "I'm getting my money's worth."

Woody Harrelson is much better. As an idealistic architect, he gets to say a neat speech about aspiring bricks (you heard me right) but doesn't get to do much else. I felt the most sympathy for him, mainly because he seemed to walk around moping. I'm not sure if it was about his predicament or his lack of character, but it was effective.

AP PHOTO

Demi Moore stars in "Indecent Proposal."

Robert Redford gets the rawest deal. The script paints him as a lonely, Gatsby-esque billionaire who just wants to be loved, damn it, but it clearly doesn't fit the type of man who buys women.

This is an all-around terrible movie. Though it was written and produced by women, it's surprisingly misogynous. It crosses the stiff, expensive melodrama of "Dynasty" with the brain-dead plotting and depth of The Bodyguard to come up with one of the worst movies of the year — it's not even worth seeing for the sex scenes — so you know it's really poor. The only indecent proposal in this movie is asking someone to go see it with you. D+

Run away: Eddie tries to sing again

COURTESY MOTOWN

Love's Alright
Eddie Murphy
Motown

Well, another album wasted due to a superstar's big ego — and I mean BIG ego. The wonder bunny I'm writing about is Eddie Murphy. His new album entitled Love's Alright is, in plain truth, awful. Who told this man to let this album go out in the stores? I literally thought that my ears were going to bleed while listening to him sing.

I even made people on my floor come in and listen to this album. Now I have a price on my head.

Now, don't get me wrong, I still have Murphy's first album with "Party All the Time," and "How Could It Be," and I actually liked those. But, I don't know what happened to this one. I can't actually say that it's Eddie's voice that ruined it, because you can't even hear it most of the time.

The sound production, music and lyrics are just horrendous. My friend Kevin's band makes better tapes, without the multi-million dollar budget.

Well, let's get to the bottom of this problem: the songs.

Canine Bastards win Five Alive

Five Alive
Bluewall
April 3, 1993

In stark contrast to the unpleasant fruit juice concoction filled with little bits which stick to the roof of your mouth, Five Alive left no unpleasant aftertaste and proved quite enjoyable. Enjoyable, that is, until the winner was announced, but I'll reserve personal opinion for a while.

Five Alive was the battle of the bands to determine the opening act for this year's much anticipated Spring Concert. Featuring five of our finest local bands — Canine Bastards, Frances Gumm, Hector, Monghani and New Radiant Storm King — it promised to be a heated competition in which the competitors would expel their highest energy performances. Indeed it was.

Frances Gumm kicked off the evening with what I heard was a high-powered set which went over quite well with the crowd. General response was along the lines of, "yeah, they were pretty good." Unfortunately, I missed the best part of the set.

Next up was Hector, a Hampshire College product. Hector combined funky grooves with brass and outstanding drumwork for the best set of the evening. Three or four songs into the set, representatives of the moshpit were chanting "Hector, Hector" in unison. Were I not so choked up thinking of the vile juice after which the show was named, I too would have chanted.

After a set of tight hooks and pleasing rhythms by Monghani, New Radiant Storm King confidently took the stage. Perhaps expectations were too lofty for the only of the five bands with a full-length release. Storm King never acheived much of a crowd response with their powerful, driving tunes. Hector was still looking like a runaway victor.

But up stepped the consummate showmen, the Canine Bastards. Complete with matching shades and slick moves, the Bastards owned the Bluewall crowd for

Revisiting sly Roger and Me

Satirical documentary chronicles GM plant closing

By MARTIN BROWN
Collegian Staff

Roger and Me is simply put, the best documentary I've ever seen. I know what you're thinking, so what, documentaries are boring - maybe so, but not in this case. Roger and Me manages to take a dreary subject, the closing of automotive factories, and turn it into a satirical piece that is informative and interesting. Roger and Me takes a close look at corporate greed, and how profit is much more important than the factory worker.

Video Pick of the Week

The movie was written, directed, and produced by Michael Moore, the only one in his family not to work for an automotive company. Basically, the premise of the movie is to take a look at what happens when General Motors pulls out of its birthplace Flint, Michigan.

The name of the movie derives from how Moore attempts to get an interview with Roger Smith, the chairman of GM. He follows him to various meetings in Detroit, New York, and Washington. It turns into a wild goose chase, but does give us some humorous scenes as Moore tries to deal with security and spokesmen.

Moore also does a beautiful job of cutting through the baloney. In the day and age where publicity departments can make a company look as though the factory worker and their jobs are the number one priority, Moore digs deeper into the hypocrisy of what upper management is saying.

For instance, Roger Smith in a Christmas Special telecast to all the GM workers around the world, reads a few lines from Charles Dickens' "A Christmas Carol," while, the same day (Christmas Eve), due to the ripple effect of the factory shutdowns, a lady and her kids are being thrown out of her house — Christmas tree and all. Moore intercuts these two conflicting scenes and makes you realize what scum Smith really is.

Moore even interviews a few celebrities along the way. Bob Eubanks tells a couple of jokes that should have ruined his floundering career (somehow it doesn't because he's hosted a couple of parades since). Anita Bryant, Pat Boone, Rev. Robert Schuller and Miss America are all perfect foils for driving home the point that they really have no concept of what is happening in Flint, yet they're there to inspire people's hope.

The movie is surrounded by quite a bit of controversy. In one of the stupidest moves the Academy has ever made, Roger and Me was not even nominated for an Academy Award. The reasons why it was ignored are probably due to both the Academy's unwillingness to nominate successful documentaries and the nature of the

The first song on this album is entitled "Yeah," an example of pumping a quick song out while having breakfast. Before I go on, let's have a little discussion about the lyrics. They're just one word - "yeah." Who's the genius who came up with this one? Can I slap them? Ten bucks Eddie wrote this one.

And, can you believe who contributed to this song? People like Bon Jovi, Garth Brooks, En Vogue, the Jackson's, Emmanuel Lewis (didn't he make you want to puke as Webster?) and others. Where are these peoples' managers? What is this world coming to? I'm scared.

"I Was A King" is the first, and hopefully last, release from Love's Alright. In this song Eddie jumps on the "to get a hit have Shabba Ranks on your song" bandwagon. There's only one way I can explain this song to those who haven't heard it. You know when you're singing a song and there's a part you don't know, so you mumble through it? Well, all I can say is, Eddie must have forgotten the lyrics - all of them. End of discussion.

The song that basically did this album in for me is a cover of the Beatles' "Good Day Sunshine." I'm weeping right now for all those people who are avid Beatles fans. There are no printable words that I can use to describe this version. Are Paul, Ringo and George that strapped for money? I wouldn't be surprised if after the release of this song there aren't bounties on Eddie's head for this. I seriously wish I could explain this song - but, for once, I'm at a loss for words.

Being the fair person I am, I forced myself to find a mediocre song that I could pump up. Well, "Don't Give Up On Love," is that song. It's a sappy, teary-eyed love song about how he was all heartbroken and felt used until he met his new wife, Nicole. After listening to that song, I felt just refreshed and ready for spring love - NOT! I had to chug some Pepto to make sure I didn't hurl on my poor roommate.

Yeah, I know that I said I would pump this song up, but it's hurting me to do so. I have to be honest to my reading audience.

As one can tell, Love's Alright is no Grammy nominee, nor is it a cassette, record, 8-track or compact disc to waste your money on. This album shouldn't have even been considered for release. Someone really needs to write or tell Eddie to please STOP!

In conclusion, I have a little tidbit to share with you. On the back cover there is a big smiley face with "Thanks, you know what you did" written under it. Yeah, for those who buy this disc, they just made Eddie's wallet a little fatter.

these forty some-odd minutes on Saturday night. The dancing and stripping far overshadowed the convoluted concoction of rhythms and yelps which the Bastards pride themselves on. This display, combined with the crowd response, caught the eyes of the judging panel.

When the Canine Bastards were announced as this year's Spring Concert opener, there were a few grumbles, but these were far outweighed by the cheers and hoots of the Bastards' devotees old and new. While some felt Hector's and Monghani's performances were winners, they could only bite their tongues and keep grumbling. It's off to the green grass in front of the pond for the Canine Bastards.

film. It is quite deliberately persuasive, and only loosely tries to be objective.

Under the standard definition of what a documentary should be, Roger and Me doesn't really fit, and because it was new and different, of course, no Oscar. The Academy again proves that anything different doesn't stand a chance against conservative (boring) works that aren't controversial.

Moore even admits, "I'm a person who doesn't like most documentaries, I'd rather see Robocop or The Terminator." He does do what he set out to, though, which is, "I wanted the ugly underpinnings of our economic system exposed. And I wanted to tell a somewhat offbeat, funny story about what the richest company in the world has done to its hometown." Moore creates a documentary that, once seen, will not be easy to forget. If you haven't seen Roger and Me, do yourself a favor and check out this documentary — it's a real eye opener.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): A residential or financial project proceeds rapidly once you make the necessary calls and trips. Heed your hunches, they will tell the true story. Do not let outsiders wreak havoc with your love life.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Taking care of business may lead you to neglect someone's emotional needs today. After your work is finished, touch base with a loved one who depends on you. Keep your cool when dealing with frustrating co-workers.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Your special talents will gain wider recognition now if you apply them to an important project. Spend the evening with someone who shared your optimistic outlook.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): You may have to deal with someone's shortcomings today. If you do not have the answer, seek expert help. Let the creative, fun-loving side of your nature take over tonight.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Wait a while before starting a major project. Progress will be swifter if you hold off for several weeks. Competing with an old friend spurs you both on to a better performance.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Take the lead in business today. Contact overseas clients about lifting old restrictions. Delay key signings until next week. Friends are more sympathetic and tolerant.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Financial squabbles can mar domestic bliss. When authorizing expenditures, check even seemingly minor details personally. Trust the experts when a personnel matter is concerned.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A roadblock is present for a reason. Heed a warning to "go slow." You gain new insights from talking to well-informed people. Hold off on making any accusations; further information is needed.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Study messages and conversations for hints. You get the "green light" on an opportunity to display your special talents. Emphasize your creativity.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): An urge to take risks grows stronger. Exercise self-discipline to avoid making a costly mistake. Secret transactions look especially fishy. Steer clear of trading favors.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): What looks like a setback could work in your favor. A partner who does not appreciate your feedback will let you know it. Stick up for your rights and you will impress someone influential.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Getting your personal life in order is the first step toward a more rewarding career. Clear the decks before getting down to business. Concentrate on finding a way to earn extra income.

Erickson gives view on the majors behind home plate

BEHIND HOME PLATE by Luke Erickson

• Derek Bell, et al goes to San Diego for Darrin Jackson. Yes, Virginia, looking good isn't as important as playing good.

• Roger Clemens complains about Sox defense, blames Gorman for failing to make the Jackson trade. What's the matter, Rocket? You mean you can't win 20 2-1 games?

• Fernando Valenzuela makes the Baltimore club, projected as the number-five starter, long man from the bullpen. Even if he's only half the pitcher he used to be — he'll be the difference come September.

• Oops Dept. Philadelphia releases Dale Murphy from a minor league contract, Murphy immediately signs with Colorado.

• Atlanta sends down western Mass native Mark Wohlers for the second consecutive spring. I guess 20.2 scoreless relief innings last September weren't enough — sad when the waiver rules dictate who makes the club, not performance.

• You-sneaky-guy quote: Florida pitcher Charlie Hough, when asked what he would throw for the first pitch of the Marlins home opener, "A strike."

• Darryl Irvine for Jeff "Whitey" Richardson. Please don't sue me Domino's, but isn't that "somethin' for nothin?"

• The Olin/Crews tragedy is a not-so-subtle reminder that baseball players are indeed human. Contrary to some people who think it will galvanize the team, it won't — it's gonna weigh upon their shoulders. A baseball season is 162 games over six months. It takes more than inspiration to sustain a pennant drive.

• Oops Dept., part two: Toronto releases journeyman David Wells, citing a poor spring. Three days later, Dave Stewart goes down with an injury. Hey, he may be fat, in the body and in the head, but he's left-handed and he throws strikes.

• Yankees open the season with a 9-1 pummeling of Cleveland. Sorry, Red Sox fans, this summer could be an awful long one. They are for real.

• Twenty years of the DH? Nineteen years too many, if you ask me. Sure it's extended a couple of great careers but it's also allowed one-dimensional players into the game. Where are you now, Sam Horn?

• Matt Young signs a minor league contract with Cleveland — Hmmm, I thought the "Mistake by the Lake" tag was history.

• The Ryan Express: Keep this in mind folks, this man is old enough to be the father of half of his teammates.

• Wally Backman — bought by the Seattle Mariners from the Atlanta Braves: can you say . . . journeyman?

• "All I wanted to do was pitch well in my first start" — Chicago Cubs' Jose Guzman after losing a no-hitter in the ninth inning of a 1-0 victory.

• Trivia Question: Who was on deck when Mookie Wilson's grounder went by Bill Buckner in 1986 (Answer next time).

Men's track faces URI

By MATT VAUTOUR
Collegian Staff

Keep your fingers crossed, track fans. With rain in the forecast for the weekend, the University of Massachusetts men's outdoor track squad still hopes to get its 1993 season underway.

After last Saturday's match up with Maine and Vermont was washed out, the Minutemen are scheduled to face Rhode Island at the Llewelyn Derby Track Saturday at noon.

The postponement was a mixed blessing. The team gained an extra week of practice time (in good weather no less) to prepare, after the abundance of snow had limited the pre-season training.

"We're in good shape for the home opener," said coach Ken O'Brien. "We've had some 50 and 60 degree weather which was really a plus."

On the other side of the coin, UMass finds itself staring at a very tough opening day opponent in Rhode Island.

"We don't shirk away from strong teams. But they will be a difficult opening day opponent," O'Brien said.

The Rams finished fourth in the New England championships during the indoor season, and are expected to place in the top five of the New England Outdoor Championships as well.

"They [UMass] know they have to gear up their game," said O'Brien. "There will be some difficult individual battles."

One individual who is sure to give UMass some battles is Dave Frederico. The multi-talented Frederico frequently gets 24 feet in the long jump, a 47-second 400 meters, and a 6'8" in the high jump. He is also Rhode Island's top sprinter. It is not out of the ordinary for him to pull down 30 points in a meet on his own.

Frederico is by no means a one-man show for Rhode Island. They boast top performers across the board in every event.

"We don't have any place we can count on scoring a bunch of points," said O'Brien, referring to the depth of this year's Rhode Island team.

The yearly match up between UMass and URI, competing in both indoor and outdoor, has become a heated rivalry, as the competitors have gotten to know each other.

Last week's postponed meet against Maine and Vermont has been rescheduled for this Wednesday at 3 p.m. at Llewelyn Derby Track.

UNDERGRADUATE COMMENCEMENT VOLUNTEERS

All employees are invited to serve as Marshals and in other volunteer capacities at Undergraduate Commencement on May 23, 1993, at the Stadium. (This is not Memorial Day weekend.)

A minimum of 50 individuals are needed.

Marshals assist in preparing degree candidates for the Processional, while other volunteers distribute programs and provide general information and assistance to guests and the Commencement Planning Committee.

The time commitment is not demanding. Marshals need to attend a pre-Commencement briefing on Thursday, May 13; a rehearsal at the Stadium on Friday, May 21; and provide service at the ceremony on May 23 from 9:00 am-noon. Others need only be at the Stadium on the day of Commencement.

In recognition of the importance of such service and as a thank you, the University will host a luncheon for all volunteers immediately after the ceremony. Each volunteer will also be eligible to participate in a drawing for tickets to selected Mullins Center events. The tickets were graciously provided by the Mullins Center management.

If interested, please contact the Visitors Center, 5-0306, by Friday, April 23. A form with further information and instructions will be sent to volunteers.

Thank you for your anticipated cooperation.

Women's track to host BU tomorrow

By ANTHONY GUIDO
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's track and field team has gotten the spring season off to a good start. This past Saturday, the Minutewomen performed well at the Yale Invitational.

The meet was an exhibition, with no team scores kept, but there were several outstanding performances. Coach Julie LaFrenniere said she was, "very happy with the performances, considering the bad weather and subsequent lack of practice."

In the best performance of the meet, Natalie Hart smashed the UMass discus record with a throw of 147 feet 6 inches. She bested the previous record by almost 20 feet.

Dianne Ozzolek placed third in the hammer, qualifying for the New England Championships at the end of the season along with Hart, who also qualified for the ECACs in Fairfax, Va.

The results from the field events are astonishing considering there are no rings on the UMass outdoor track, limiting throwing events to minimal indoor practice.

In the 1500-meter, Becky Johnson was the winner in 4:41, a personal record. Janey Meeks placed second in the 400-meter in 59.7 seconds.

Both Johnson and Meeks qualified for the New Englands in their individual events as well as the 400-meter relay. They teamed with Kerry Aker and Lynnice Johnson to win at Yale.

Coach LaFrenniere held Meeks, a tremendous triple-jumper, back from her best event because it was too cold and she hadn't been able to practice outdoors.

UMass was finally able to participate in a meet after having their first two home meets canceled due to the inclement weather.

On Saturday, April 10, UMass hosts rivals Boston University and the University of Rhode Island at Llewelyn Derby Track. BU is a strong opponent, and the Minutewomen beat Rhode Island by one point during the indoor season.

"Outdoors, we should be able to defeat both teams, but it'll be real tight," said LaFrenniere.

Having just tied the WRams at the Atlantic 10 indoor finals, UMass should be ready for the team's first home meet. BU is one of the tougher opponents UMass will face in the beginning of the season, although not as strong a team outdoors.

The team looks to start off with a winning record on Saturday, then build on it in the Worcester Invitational April 14-17.

the Bulldogs lost to No. 6 Brown on Wednesday and a loss to the Minutemen tomorrow could mean a huge drop in the polls. But the Gorillas, who beat No. 9 Duke last Sunday, could vault a few spaces in the polls with a victory in New Haven.

"They're [Yale] going to come out with a lot of fire because we only beat them by a goal last year," said Garber. "But if we come out and execute all our shots, don't commit any stupid penalties and play hard, we'll be all right."

Lax Notes: Millon has scored a goal in 30 straight games and a goal or an assist in 32 consecutive games . . . Yale won only three of 18 faceoffs against Brown, a stat which UMass hopes to see again tomorrow . . . the game can be heard on WMUA (91.1 f.m.) with Mike Fagerson doing the play-by-play.

meet, which will take place April 16-17. Braud will finally get a crack at the best competitors.

"If I can hit (my set), I can win," Braud said. "It's weird, just thinking about it. I didn't start gymnastics until eighth grade, while most others have been doing it since they were very young. It's amazing for me to think that I'm in the nationals, and I've been doing it for only eight years."

"I think Jay will do very well," said Johnson. "[Jay] is psyched about being there. I think the main thing he has to be able to do is stay focused once he steps onto the floor.

"I think he'll have another great routine. He can qualify for the final round. At finals, I think he'll have one of the best routines in the country."

■ softball

mount a rally in the top of the seventh.

Senior righthander Darlene Claffey started the second game for Sortino, but was only able to go two innings, allowing two hits and no runs.

"Her rhythm was off, and you could just tell," Sortino said of her ace. "Her pitches were up and we tried to have her work it out on the sideline, but it wasn't working out."

While Claffey was in there, she received some huge defensive support that came in the form of Minutewoman left fielder Stacey Nichols. Nichols gunned down a runner tagging from third base with a picture perfect throw to catcher Sherri Kuchinskas, who applied the tag for the double play to end the second inning.

UConn got one run in the fourth off freshman Dana Colla (0-1) who took the loss in relief of Claffey. Colla surrendered a leadoff double to start the fourth and was pulled in favor of game one starter Daut, who then gave up a single and a fielder's choice to plate the Huskies' first run of the game.

UConn struck for one more in the fifth when Blackman and left fielder Andrea D'Innocenzo hit identical doubles to the left field gap.

UMass was unable to get anything going against the crafty Venice, who retired the last 11 Minutewomen she faced.

Dart pitches past Jeffs

Starter helps men in win over Amherst

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Young baseball teams which have not had a lot of experience in the field tend to be inconsistent. The University of Massachusetts baseball team tends to be one of them.

Thursday, the team was inconsistent in a good way, shaking off the 12-2 loss UConn handed it the day before and pounding cross-town rival Amherst College 10-1.

Freshman David Dart (1-1) picked up his first victory of the year, baffling the Lord Jeffs in five innings of work by allowing only five hits while his teammates were providing him with nine runs of support.

The 9-0 lead after four allowed head coach Mike Stone a good deal of leeway in deciding how long he would keep Dart in. Dart whiffed five in five innings, but Stone said he thought he was tired.

"I thought David pitched fairly well," said Stone. "I would like him to get a little more velocity on the fastball, and to get ahead of the hitters a little more, though, but it was nice to bounce back."

"He didn't say I'd be the third starter if I pitched well, he just said to go out and do well," said Dart. "I just came out to win."

"I've been pitching a lot lately, and I started on two days' rest. That might have been why I tired in the fifth."

The Minutemen (7-8) almost put the game away in the first inning when they scored four runs at Memorial Field off Lord Jeffs starter Adam Slocum. With two outs, shortstop Greg LaRocca, first baseman Bill Knight and designated hitter Keith Richards all drove in runs.

The second and third innings provided much of the same, as left fielder Justin Howard hit a two-run home run putting UMass up 6-0. Knight's blast in the third made it 7-0.

"I thought we'd be all right [after the loss to UConn]," said Knight, who was 4-for-5 with 3 runs and 2 RBIs. "We've been putting too much pressure on ourselves lately, because we're expecting a lot."

"We kind of put yesterday behind us," said freshman second baseman Mark Pileski. "The coaches told us this game was for the bragging rights of the town, so it was a matter of pride for us."

Indeed, Amherst (8-2) was ranked No. 25 in Division III and is always a tough opponent for the Minutemen, although UMass has now won three of the last four years.

The Minutemen host their first Atlantic 10 series of the year as the Rutgers Scarlet Knights come to Lorden Field on Saturday and Sunday. UMass is looking to improve on its 2-3 A-10 record.

Minutewomen shut out by UConn 4-0, 2-0

By SEAN P. HAYDEN
Collegian Staff

STORRS, Conn. — After dominating and out-playing its last two opponents, the University of Massachusetts softball team had the tables turned yesterday when it was swept by the University of Connecticut in a doubleheader by the scores of 4-0 and 2-0.

The Minutewomen, now 6-11 overall and 2-0 in the Atlantic-10, could manage only five hits in the two games against the tough Husky pitching of game one starter Pat Conlan and Janna Venice, who pitched in the nightcap.

"I thought their pitchers did a good job keeping us off balance," UMass head coach Elaine Sortino said. "I think we could have hit the ball a little bit better, but I don't want to take anything away from Janna or from Patty. They kept us off stride."

The first game saw UMass sophomore Kelly Daut (3-6) hooked up in a classic pitcher's duel with Conlan (11-3). At one point, Daut had retired 13 Huskies in a row, while Conlan was equally impressive, setting down 10 consecutive Minutewomen.

Things went awry for Daut in the sixth inning, however. After retiring the leadoff batter, Daut walked Venice. Husky second baseman Shari Blackman followed that up with a single to left that sent Venice to second. Things looked okay for Daut when Venice was ruled out on a runner's interference call for crashing into UMass shortstop Amy Powell, who was attempting to field a ground ball hit to her.

The situation soon took a turn for the worse when UConn third baseman Chris Woodman hit a slow roller in the gap between third base and shortstop. UMass third baseman Laurie Dondarski made a nice play in diving to her left to stab the ball, but she was unable to make a play, loading the bases with two outs.

After Daut walked in a run, UConn outfielder Kim Staehle hit what appeared to be a routine fly ball to right, but Jenn Salisbury was unable to come up with the basket catch. That cleared the bases and set up the final score as the Minutewomen were unable to

Gorillas head to Yale, take on No. 16 Bulldogs

The University of Massachusetts lacrosse team heads to Yale to face the No. 16 Bulldogs in what promises to be a rough game. Last year's contest in Amherst ended in a brawl at midfield.

By JEFF HOJLO

There's something about those New England collegiate rivalries that always gets the competitive juices flowing. The University of Massachusetts' and Yale University's men's lacrosse squads are no exception.

Last year's battle, a close game in which UMass won 8-7, ended in a brawl in the middle of Garber Field. This year, coach Ted Garber thinks there will be a lot of tension left over from last year when the two teams face off in New Haven, Conn., tomorrow at 1 p.m.

Each team is going to be out there just waiting for the other to push a little too far," said Garber. "But it's still going to be a tough game — a lot tougher than the Providence game (18-3 W)."

The Bulldogs (4-3 overall) boast three of the best attackmen in the country in sophomore Tony Rousou, senior Rocky Mould and junior Simon Duxbury. Rousou is the team leader in assists with 16 and also has tallied nine goals in the first seven games. Mould has 15 points on the season, on 11 goals and four assists, and Duxbury has nine goals. The defense has been anchored so far this year by Rich Dressler, who boasts an impressive 0.66 save percentage.

UMass is led by All-American Mark Millon, who has compiled a whopping 18 goals to go with eight assists. Attackman Wes Depp has also had a good year with 15 goals and Greg Kline has seven assists.

Going into the game, Yale is ranked 16th in the country, right behind UMass, which is ranked 15th. But

Men's gymnast Braud qualifies for Nationals

By ANDREW BRYCE
Collegian Staff

Jason Braud has kept his 1992-1993 season alive by qualifying for the National Collegiate Men's Gymnastics Championships, which will be held at the University of New Mexico's University Arena in Albuquerque, N.M., this weekend.

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnast scored a 9.625 in the floor exercise at the NCAA Eastern Regional meet, good enough for fourth place and a shot at the national championship.

Braud, a junior, became the highest qualifying UMass gymnast ever on the floor exercise as he garnered the fourth place finish. He finished behind Kerry Houston of Minnesota, who won the event with a 9.700, Chad Babcock of Western Michigan (9.765), and John Roethlisberger of Minnesota (9.650).

"It was a good routine, not one of my greatest routines," said Braud. "I was happy with it, though. I had no major breaks. The only break I had was on the dismount. Other than that, I felt pretty good. I felt like it was enough to do it," he said.

Co-captain Steve Christensen competed in the last gymnastics meet of his collegiate career as he fell short of making the national meet in the pommel horse. Christensen, who entered the Regional meet second in the nation on the pommel, scored a 9.350, well behind Roethlisberger of Minnesota (9.725).

"Steve got off to a good start," said UMass head coach Roy Johnson. "He was swinging well on his first skill, and as he was coming out of his first skill, I think he was leaning forward too much. He piked right up, and I think he separated his legs a little bit too much."

"I thought it was a small deduction, but unfortunately, the judges must have taken a bigger deduction than I did," he said.

While Johnson was disappointed by Christensen's misfortune, he said he was very pleased with Braud's performance.

"Jay's routine was just about perfect up until his dismount. He had about two or three tenths (taken off) his dismount. His routine was obviously one of the best in the country," Johnson said.

Braud is excited about the national

Jury in deliberation of Rodney King case

By LINDA DEUTSCH
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — It's a different court in a different town, but the key question is the same: Did the four officers who beat Rodney King abide by police rules in subduing him or did they beat him to do harm?

Lawyers pulled out all the stops in a two-month trial in which prosecutors maintained that the white officers not only used excessive force in the beating of King, a Black motorist, but did so intentionally.

Nearly a year after a state jury in suburban Simi Valley acquitted the officers on most of the charges, setting off an explosion of rioting in Los Angeles, the hot potato that has left a city unnerved is in the hands of a federal jury deciding whether King's civil rights were violated.

Before the case went to the jury Saturday afternoon, the panel was warned by U.S. District Judge John G. Davies to ignore "any external consequences of your verdict."

Deliberations, which lasted about two and a half hours Saturday, didn't resume until noon Sunday to allow jurors to attend Easter services.

The defense introduced new technological evidence and offered colorful courtroom demonstrations. Prosecutors were no less dramatic in calling civilian witnesses who gave emotional accounts of the beating to remind jurors how horrible the scene appeared on March 3, 1991.

If convicted, the officers face up to 10 years in prison and $250,000 in fines.

The opponents in this civil rights trial essentially put on two cases: the emotional case and the factual one.

On the emotional angle, the government called King to the stand for the first time to tell of his pain as officers beat and shocked him with an electronic stun gun. "I was just trying to stay alive," he said.

In final arguments, Justice Department attorney Barry Kowalski acknowledged that King has little to add factually.

"The government called Rodney King to testify not because he has a perfect recollection of this incident," he said.

"... We called him to show you the one thing that the defense doesn't want to admit, that Rodney King is not some PCP-crazed maniac."

In the factual arguments, prosecutors showed the videotape of King's beating and had a Los Angeles Police Department use-of-force expert analyze the officers' actions.

Sgt. Mark Conta, head of physical training and self-defense at the city Police Academy, said Powell should have stopped beating King after his baton blows knocked King to the ground.

"An officer should only use the force that is reasonable and necessary to overcome a suspect's resistance," Conta said. "Officer Powell was completely outside of the LAPD policy."

About 32 seconds into the videotaped beating, Conta said all blows and kicks by the defendants were unreasonable.

The defense's emotional case hinged on courtroom demonstrations — two policemen rolling around on the floor to show how King could have grabbed an officer's gun, an attorney swinging a baton and Koon taking the stand to accept responsibility for his officers' actions.

Koon, a 14-year police veteran, cast himself as the consummate cop, a cool, forthright leader who knew better than anyone else what should be done. He said he was sure King was under the influence of PCP and had the strength of "The Hulk."

WWII veteran offers vision of equality

By JENNIFER L. PRESS

American Liberator Paul Parks said at a lecture Thursday night in the Campus Center that unless we learn that all people are human and deserve to be treated equally in society, we will revisit all of the Holocausts of the past.

Parks, a former Massachusetts Secretary of Education and currently president of his own engineering firm in Boston, reflected on his experiences as a member of an all-Black army unit in World War II, which participated in the liberation of Nazi death camps.

"Everybody in this nation truly has the same rights as everyone else because we all exist," Parks said. "No one has the right to make a decision about my acceptability. I am acceptable to me."

Parks's emotional pleas for equality and an end to racism come from a lifetime of living with segregation and bigotry because of the color of his skin.

Parks grew up in a completely African-American environment where he learned of three groups of people— "Blacks, Whites, and Jews". It was not until he enrolled in Purdue University in Indiana that he became aware of racial prejudice, because he was one of the seven blacks on a campus of 12,000 students.

Calling his years at Purdue his "most awesome experience", Parks said it was almost impossible for an African-American engineering student to

Chancellor search not reopened

Committee narrows choice down to two finalists

Two candidates' names for the University of Massachusetts chancellorship were forwarded Friday by the fifteen-member Chancellor Search Committee to University President Michael K. Hooker, who will make the final decision.

The finalists are Claudia Mitchell-Kernan, vice chancellor and dean of graduate programs at the University of California at Los Angeles, and David Scott, distinguished professor in Learning, Science and Society at Michigan State University. Both candidates met with students, faculty and staff a few weeks ago during their two day University visit.

Before reaching their decision, the Search Committee deliberated whether to reopen the search, said Vice-President for Academic Affairs Ron Story.

"The search committee decided that we would not reopen the search," said committee member Abél Ponce de Leon, who is an associate professor in the Department of Veterinary and Animal Sciences. "Both have been recommended. We are in the process of writing a report and we will give it to President Hooker next week."

Committee member Jane Giacobbe, who is an assistant Management professor, said they came up with their two choices out of the positive response from student, faculty, staff and, non-campus and campus groups.

Violence erupts in South Africa

By TINA SUSMAN

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Two Whites were burned to death by a Black crowd and a third had part of his tongue cut out despite appeals for calm Sunday, a day after a popular African National Congress official was assassinated.

The ANC said the slaying of the Black activist, Chris Hani, would not derail negotiations with the government on ending apartheid.

In a separate incident, police fired on a crowd in the Black township of Soweto, killing one Black.

The ANC, the nation's largest Black group, also accused security officials of ignoring requests for special protection for Hani, who witnesses said was gunned down by a White.

Police reported they found a "hit list" containing names of ANC and ruling National Party officials in the home of the White man arrested in the assassination, but refused to reveal the names on the list.

President F. W. de Klerk, with the backing of his National Party, has been dismantling apartheid and holding talks with Black groups on ending White minority rule.

De Klerk and ANC President Nelson Mandela appealed for calm in televised addresses, but at least two attacks occurred Sunday.

The ANC accused police of firing on a small memorial service for Hani in Soweto, near Johannesburg, killing one person. Police Maj. Henriette Bester denied it was a memorial service and said officers fired on the crowd after people began throwing stones and shooting at them.

The three White men had driven into Lwandli Black township outside Cape Town to buy beer when their two vehicles were stoned and set afire by a crowd, police said. Police said two were killed and one injured. A fourth man

Vanna changing her old image

BOSTON (AP)— Vanna White, star of television's top-rated syndicated show, says she's no bimbo.

White, in town to tape several "Wheel of Fortune" shows, acknowledged that some people perceive her as an empty-headed letter-turner. But, she added, that perception doesn't bother her and it's not true.

"No, that doesn't make me angry. I feel everyone is entitled to their opinion. If that's what they think, it's OK," she told the Boston Sunday Herald.

"If I was sitting there watching TV and saw this woman turning letters for 10 years, I would probably think the same thing."

White has started her own enterprise, "Vanna White Inc.," to sell her nationally recognized image, and has other business interests.

"I think I've branched out from 'Wheel of Fortune,' gotten a better business sense," White said. "I'm not patting myself on the back. I've worked very hard for a very, very long time."

A native of North Myrtle Beach, S.C., White beat out 200 other hopefuls to win the "Wheel" letter-turning job in 1982.

Two years ago, she married restaurant chain owner George Santo Pietro, and her much heralded pregnancy ended in miscarriage in September.

"It's was God's will; that's the way I'm going to look at it," she said. She hopes to have another child within the next two years, and said fans won't have to discover it in the tabloids. "If I get pregnant again, definitely we're going to show it on TV," White said.

escaped.

Police did not know whether the attack was in response to Hani's assassination Saturday. But mob attacks on Whites are rare.

At a news conference Sunday, the ANC said Hani's death should inspire political parties to work more fervently for a peaceful end to apartheid.

Negotiations between Black and White groups resumed this month after having collapsed in May amid political violence.

"Any suggestion of calling off the negotiations process is to play into the hands of the murderers. This is their purpose, and we must defeat that purpose," said Joe Slovo, a top ANC official.

Police arrested Januzu Jakub Wallus, 40, hours after Hani's killing and on Sunday said a pistol found in Wallus' car was the murder weapon. Police said the pistol had been stolen from an air force weapons depot in Pretoria in 1990.

The same weapons depot was broken into that year by a White extremist, but it was not immediately clear if the pistol was stolen then.

Project tackles issue of breast cancer through art

By KENDRA WILLETT
Collegian Staff

One in eight women born in the United States will develop breast cancer in her lifetime, up from one in 20 in 1961 according to Joyce Sacco.

Because of statistics like this, students at the University of Massachusetts have been awarded a grant to place issues regarding breast cancer in an artful context.

Sacco, a coordinator for the project said a temporary installation will be set up and a performance is scheduled for Tuesday, May 4th.

On the south terrace of the Fine Arts Center, students will present a combination of widely diverse text, clay, movement and sound to provoke reflection on these issues, according to information released about the project.

Sunny Miller, also a coordinator of the project, became involved in dealing with the issue of breast cancer when she noticed the increase of women with the disease.

"The installation and performance will give more information than just setting up a table in the campus center," Miller said.

The main component of the installation will be two

Library fund to be supported by reception

By TRACY MONAHAN

The Friends of the Library and the faculty senate committee plan to hold a reception for UMass men's basketball coach John Calipari and his Atlantic 10 championship team.

Calipari has made a substantially donation to the library fund and has expressed interest in bettering conditions at the library.

"We have a basketball team in the A.P. top 20, let's put our library in the top 20 of the [Association of Research Libraries]," Calipari said.

Daniel Martin, chair of the faculty senate library committee, said UMass is one of the only public institutions in the state with a research library.

The reception will be on April 22 in Memorial Hall from 4-6 p.m. All faculty, staff and students are welcome.

Martin said there will be free food, soft drinks and a cash bar. Students from the HRTA department will be on hand to assist with the catering.

Martin also said there will be a cardboard box with a basketball hoop on top for people to "dunk" their donations.

The committee is also having a color poster printed up that will be sold for five dollars. Coach Calipari will be available to sign posters. A few team members will also be present.

Five students from the music department will be playing jazz in a special "rhythm section."

Martin said the event is being held to "drum up" support for the library fund. Donations will be used to purchase books for the library.

According to Martin, other areas to be looked at include library security, study areas and updating the supply of reference materials.

Martin said the committee also plans to have a "book display." Faculty are encouraged to lend their published works to be displayed on the steps of the State House.

The centerpiece will be the Geographical Atlas of Massachusetts which was the collaborative work of several UMass professors and was given to all of the state's legislators.

Zen and the art of repairing Amherst's potholes

By JOHN WINCHELL
Collegian Staff

Editor's note: This is the first in a series of articles on Signs of Spring here at UMass

With the melting of winter's last snow, drivers can breathe a final sigh of relief and expect relatively safe road conditions, right?

Not exactly.

Signs of Spring

The recent change of season also marks the beginning of probably the worst times of year for commuters—springtime pothole repair. Where the roadways were icy and snow-covered for the last several months during what has been called the worst winter in memory, they are now littered with hundreds of potholes, ranging in size from small to downright cavernous.

"The roads have taken a real beating over the winter because of all the plowing and sanding from the snow," said Marc Fournier, Solid Waste Manager at the University of Massachusetts Physical Plant.

Physical plant road crews have been busy street-sweeping and coal-patching potholes to compensate for the deteriorated road conditions. Coal-patching serves as a temporary fix to fill in and cover a pothole until it can be permanently hot-patched.

"Coal-patching is very temporary; it gets washed away with rain and gets loosened up by cars driving over it," Fournier said.

The procedure is simple: coal is poured into the hole, and then packed down to level the road surface until a hot-patch can be done.

Physical Plant crew member Tony Kozcur said, "It usually takes about a minute or so to fill in a coal-patch. It depends on the size."

On a warm Friday afternoon, a crew worked on patching some potholes on a road parallel to University Drive.

Wet coal overflowed in several holes after being dumped by a backhoe. The mounds of glistening black coal were plowed over again by the backhoe to level them out to the road's surface. The workers then shoveled the patches once more to assure their uniformity.

"If the traffic is speeding like it usually is, they (coal-patches) don't last long at all," said James Hendricks, another crew member.

A few minutes after the patches are done, the sound of loose coal granules striking the inside of wheel wells was heard as cars and trucks sped over the patches.

Crew foreman Donald Stefanik estimated that crews have been filling about 150 potholes a day since repairs began.

"We usually just concentrate it in one area at a time," he said.

On heavy days, crews can use between 10 and 12 tons of coal just for patching. The worst areas to be repaired so far are, according to Kozcur, Eastman Lane and around the Engineering Complex.

"They should just repave the road, overlay it, and not have to pay so much money every year," he said.

Commenting on the current state of campus roadways, Fournier said, "Everywhere there are roads around here, they're in bad condition."

After today, crews will begin hot-patching all the potholes with concrete from the Warner Bros. Concrete Plant in Sunderland. The plant opens this morning, providing asphalt for the more permanent hot-patch method.

"We will dig out the holes out (of the coal), and fill them with hot-patch," said Fournier.

Best-selling author lectures about 'quality management'

By KELLY SPANG
Collegian Staff

Philip Crosby spoke about quality management last Thursday at a lecture hosted by the School of Management. Crosby is the author of seven best-sellers on the subject of quality.

Quality, according to Crosby, is not "goodness" because it must be a measurable quantity of a company's revenue.

Crosby defined quality as "conformist requirements" that a company must meet in order to satisfy its customers in both the service and manufacturing businesses.

"Better requirements lead to improvements," he said.

The price of non-conformism is high. Crosby said the losses a manufacturing company endures because of defects in its product is about 25% of its revenues.

"Quality is where the profit can come from," he explained.

Crosby said he developed the concept he calls "zero defects." He said it is necessary to "do it right the first time" in providing a good or service.

In the 21th Century, Crosby said he forecasts a world economy. Quality will be an important factor for companies to compete in the new economy.

"The system of quality is prevention," he said. Companies need to find out where the problem is and fix it. However, it is also necessary to make the problems not happen again. "Fix it forever," Crosby said.

"Allowable defect rates destroy the integrity of a company," he said.

It is necessary for management to form a standard of production which clearly defines its expectations from the workers. Each managing team should maintain a philosophy about quality and business, according to Crosby.

■ author

"Develop you own personal philosophy," he said to managers, "but make sure it makes sense."

Education, Crosby said, is also important in quality management. Workers should know the goals of the company and perform up to the standard.

The three main concerns management should have are: making the employees, the suppliers and the customers successful, according to Crosby.

"The purpose of a company is to make lives," he said. People work for money but Crosby believes the main goal of workers is "appreciation."

Management should train good, dedicated people and hold on to them. Crosby said it takes about a year to train an employee fully so companies need to have "veteran" workers and slow the turnover rate of hiring new people.

In his discussion of making a company successful, Crosby addressed the workers. There needs to be communication between the management and the workers.

"Treat your people right," Crosby told managers.

counterparts [from the candidates' school] and reporting it back," Giacobbe said. "We continue to gather extraordinary amounts of information, because we have not put together written recommendations."

Furthermore, Committee member Esther Terry, who is an Associate Professor and Chair at the W.E.B. DuBois Department of Afro-American Studies Department, added "what obviously set [the candidates] apart was campus response."

But Speaker of the Student Senate Matt Pavesi said he did not think any of the candidates were qualified. Mentioning that Mitchell-Kernan and Scott come from strongly state supported public schools, Pavesi said they would not know how to fight for higher education in the Massachusetts legislature.

"We do need a chancellor who is going to get in there and lobby," Pavesi said. "It is ridiculous that my tuition has gone up four hundred dollars."

Last week the Student Senate voted unanimously to ask the Search Committee to reopen their search. Pavesi said the action they voted on included the candidate's character, understanding and reception of students, and vision for the University.

"I don't have confidence in any of them. We should not settle for second best," Pavesi said. "This person could be in office for the next 16 years."

Yet Student Government President David Nuñez said that although he feels Mitchell-Kernan is the right person for the chancellorship, he would not mind seeing the search opened.

Nuñez said Mitchell's enthusiasm, in addition to being from a strong school system, attracted him to this candidate.

"It seemed like she had the willingness and desire to make the changes at UMass," Nuñez said. "I thought that if she becomes chancellor, it wouldn't be a bad thing."

large circles representing breast forms, and an imagery of mother earth at the center, Miller said.

The performances will include students from a peer health class, and will deal mostly with the emotional aspects of having breast cancer, Miller said.

Participating students will be able to seek advice from survivors of breast cancer throughout the preparation. They will also research connections between breast cancer and environmental toxins, pesticides, x-rays, diet, the pill and hereditary factors.

"We need to make this information available to college women who may know someone with the disease, or may one day have it themselves," said Sacco, "and men also need to be aware of the issue."

According to Sacco, there will be 5,500 new cases of breast cancer and 1,400 deaths reported this year in Massachusetts.

Miller said it is time to start looking at why the incidents of the disease are on the rise, and making college students aware of the issue is a step in the right direction.

succeed. He was frequently reprimanded by the Dean for his attempts to desegregate Purdue's dormitories and dining halls.

In 1942, Parks was drafted by the Army to fight in World War II, partly because of his beliefs that everyone should have equal rights. Purdue urged him to enlist because they felt he needed to learn discipline.

After many altercations with white soldiers and officers, Parks was sent to Europe as part of an all-Black unit. All of his officers were white.

"We were called the bad seed," he said. "We were all unhappy about our roles as soldiers of war."

Parks's unit was sent to Germany where he saw something that truly horrified him.

"We saw long barracks and emaciated bodies dressed in prisoner's clothes. We didn't know what we were looking at," Parks said of his first experience at a Nazi concentration camp. "We asked why they were being killed and they answered 'because we're Jews'. It made no sense."

Parks said it did make sense as he remembered how his ancestors had lived and died in slavery. Calling Hitler a "student of American slavery", he said the two Holocausts were "very very similar".

Parks said he believes his unit learned a valuable lesson that day.

"There is no way to reach a level of intelligence when dealing with bigotry towards another human. You can't graduate from an institute of higher learning and be smart if you can look at someone and say you are less than me," he said, adding "Accidental birth doesn't make you any better."

Parks said it was this lesson and the segregation that he endured while at Purdue that led him to finish school and work for equal rights and privileges in the educational system.

"I don't expect an ideal world. I expect a world where well-educated people won't walk around like idiots harboring bigotry," he said.

The lecture was sponsored by the Black Mass Communication Project and Hillel's Black/Jewish Relations Committee with funding by the Chancellor's Commission for Civility and Human Relations.

Editorial/Opinion

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers or cartoonists and do not necessarily reflect those of the Collegian unless otherwise noted.

'Racial prejudism' must be analyzed

People have a difficult time differentiating between racial prejudism and racism. They naively equate the two terms and thus equate the status between Whites and non-Whites in this country.

Racial prejudism is the unfavorable or stereotypical opinions or feelings about people of one racial group held by another. This is exercised through acts of discrimination, treating someone differently simply because that person belongs to a certain group. Most acts of prejudism are highly visible, like derogatory labeling.

However, racism is a political term which defines a power relationship between groups and aids in identifying which group possesses the ability to exercise their prejudices to successfully gain advantages over other groups. Here in the United States, it is Whites who yield power over non-Whites through financial and political means. Thus, racism is specifically defined as the systematic oppression of people of color by Whites.

Racism is more dangerous than racial prejudism because it is camouflaged and thus difficult to pinpoint. Unlike the old Klan, today's White prejudism has been successfully institutionalized through the media, education, capital punishment, real estate, etc. Whites control more than a considerable part of all these institutions which they tend to abuse and manipulate in their favor. In this manner, Whites reap the benefits of the system at the expense of non-Whites.

White prejudism exercised through these types of channels is much more devastating to people's lives than someone practicing reverse discrimination. Even in cases of reverse discrimination, Black prejudism cannot be equated with White prejudism. Whites denigrate Blacks because of their appearance, while Black hostility is rooted in their historical oppression by Whites. Nonetheless, racial prejudism still appears a two-way street by many.

Contrastly, there is clearly no equality in enmity when concerning the issue of racism. To use racial prejudism and racism interchangeably is denying a large portion of reality. Such usage repudiates the fact that Whites, due to past and present racist policies, are considerably better off economically than people of color. Also of importance is to realize that people of color are not concerned with overt prejudism as much as covert racism. It is the latter which creates the large income inequality between Whites and non-Whites and thus unequal standard of living. Being called a "spic" or a "nigger" has never affected me as much as watching my people live in poverty.

Thus if we are ever to progress, White people in this country must begin to accept the existence of a racist system which their forefathers designed and which many of them today, knowingly or not, help to sustain. It is only through this realization that steps can be made to transform the system and state apparatus into something it proclaims to already be, a land of equality.

Irish question: no answer

In 1921, the island of Ireland was divided between an Irish Free State in the south (almost entirely Catholic) and a six-county enclave with a Protestant majority in the North that remained, and remains, governed from London. Since 1969 the Irish Republican Army has pursued a terrorist war to end British rule in Northern Ireland, and loyalist paramilitary groups have killed to intimidate Northern Catholics and destroy the nationalist movement.

Jesse
ARMSTRONG

Last month, 3-year-old Jonathan Ball and Tim Parry, 12, were killed by an IRA bomb planted on a shopping street of the English town of Warrington. The killings prompted a spontaneous demonstration for peace in Dublin led by Susan McHugh, an Irish mother with no previous involvement in public politics. "Loyalist" gunmen in Northern Ireland made their own response to the killings by murdering six Catholics over the course of the next seven days.

In Northern Ireland (as in Bosnia and Israel), the question is: are we prisoners of history, or can a cycle of violence be broken?

"The IRA did not kill Jonathan Ball in my name or in your name. I want to tell the world tonight they did not kill him in the name of Ireland. There's nothing wrong with being emotional about a little boy's death. I feel horror, revulsion and sadness. But that's not enough. Tonight I feel anger.

"I feel angry and frustrated because the political will is not there to end the violence. . . Maybe it's time it was looked at from a different angle. Maybe it's time we asked for UN troops and independent arbitrators from Europe or the outside world." — Susan McHugh, speaking at the rally she organized.

"I can remember 20 years ago a doctor whose daughter was killed in a bombing making a statement saying he hoped some good would come of his daughter's death. The horrible reality is that these deaths are wasted, a complete waste of human life." — a lawyer in Northern Ireland.

"The only soldiers who can act in my name are the peacekeepers we send to the Lebanon. Anyone else is a murderer as far as I'm concerned." — woman signing the "book of condolence" in Dublin.

"The outrage at the children being killed only reminds us here of the number of our children that have been killed, with no outrage in England for them. We have a surfeit of killing — you either topple over with emotion or you block it out. . .

"What's happening in Dublin is the distancing of southern Ireland from Northern Ireland. . . They almost view all of us in Northern Ireland now as savages, uncivilized. They don't react to deaths here now. They feel that England doesn't deserve it — but in a sense they feel that we deserve it." — Catholic community worker in Northern Ireland.

"The first thing I thought of doing was moving out of here, but after seeing all the people and support you've got here, it's just incredible really, there's that many good people here in Northern Ireland." — Joe Dalrymple, whose father was killed by Protestant loyalist gunmen.

"Too long a sacrifice can make a stone of the heart." — W.B. Yeates in "Easter 1916."

"War is war and these things are going to happen in war." — caller to Irish phone-in radio show, regarding the Warrington bombing.

"The sympathy for the Warrington parents is very good and warming and I share it. But this could have an adverse effect. The politics of this last atrocity is a very bad basis for a peace movement. Next week there could be Catholic children burnt in their beds in Belfast. . . Will there be flowers for them?" — Father Denis Faul, Northern Irish priest.

Song of violence just isn't funny

Brian Babineau's listing of songs that might ease the angst of failed romance (Collegian, April 8) was amusing except for one glaring inclusion: Guns n' Roses' "Used to Love Her (but I had to kill her)." Axl Rose's spew is trendy and hateful, but there's yet another reason to condemn it — it enhances a misogynist, violent male subculture.

Why is this song considered humorous? According to FBI statistics, 30 percent of female homicides are allegedly committed by their male partners; four American women are killed every day and their murders are attributed to their boyfriends or husbands. In Massachusetts, every eight days a woman has been murdered, allegedly by her male partner. UMass student Tara Hartnett was killed last month, allegedly by her estranged boyfriend, James Cyr.

Men (and women) who sing along with Axl should get together and visit a local courthouse or a battered women's shelter. If we lived in a society where homicidal boyfriends and husbands were unknown, and restraining orders were needless, Axl Rose wouldn't be such a repugnant figure.

Tenants trying to get rid of bugs evict themselves instead

Probably for the first time in my life, I'm not orgasmically delirious that April has arrived. April is the month that brings both spring and rain in on its coattails, and usually I adore them both — spring for obvious reasons, and rain because it melts away the piles of ugly white stuff spewed from the sky during the winter months. But this year, these little gems of nature are causing me more problems than I ever dreamed they were capable of.

Before I delve into the horrific details of my plight, let me provide some background information. My roommate and I live in a cottage built in the spacious backyard of a house rented out by its owner. We were attracted to this bungalow-style apartment a year ago primarily for its surprisingly low rent, but since then we have learned things about it that greatly erase that element of surprise.

For example, this winter we discovered that despite the high bills we paid for the electric heat, this structure is not capable of retaining heat. In addition, our storm door was literally peeled off its frame like a banana by high winds shortly before Christmas. Not to mention the fact that nothing in the place works, or that the water heater is only capable of supplying enough hot water for three-fourths of a shower per two-hour time frame. But we became accustomed to these quaint inconveniences after a while, so we stayed.

Then came the heavy rains that melted all the snow. Normally, I think this ritual spring phenomenon is glorious. The problem is that when the accumulation of all that rain plus hoards of liquified snow banks have no place to drain, baby flash floods and tiny oceans are given birth to. Usually, this would be no big deal. The yard would be aquatic for a while and then the sun would dry it up.

Amy
SCOTT

This year I have the dumb luck of living in a structure that was not built to withstand human habitation standards. Now our apartment is flooded to such a degree that the floor is beginning to smell like a decomposing junk yard in June, and every insect known by science is being washed in by this flood. I burn incense every waking moment I spend at home, wear an old pair of shoes at all times, and kill free time by flicking water beetles off the bed. Going home has become a truly nauseating experience lately.

Do any of you know what it's like to feel repulsed by your own home? If you don't, let me describe the feeling: it's like staying in a cheesy motel room where the bathroom has chippable layers of mildew on the walls, the dust balls are like tumbleweed, and the sheets are rancid with the lingering odor of "fertile" bodily fluids and Ultra Tide. And even though we don't quite have problems of this nature, being clean people and all, we could swear we were staying in a motel.

We called the health inspector and housing bureau, and they claim not only that our humble abode is unfit to live in, but that it is illegal to live in such a place. This made us reasonably happy, because our landlord must, by law, pay for us to move and finance our first month's rent in the new place. We wanted to move soon, anyway.

Then the housing bureau told us they were coming by within three days to condemn the apartment, to prevent the landlord from ever renting it out again. But wait, there's a big problem here: How are we going to find a place to live and move in that quickly? The answer is simple: we can't. We thought that by solving this problem by manipulating the legal bylaws, we'd be using the system to make life a bit easier (and cheaper). Instead, we went and evicted ourselves and proved what raving idiots we really are.

Now that I am nearly homeless and up to my eyeballs in problems, I have but one question to ask: why is it that other people can walk around in a neck brace and whine about a phantom case of whiplash, and get thousands of dollars in compensation through sleazy litigation, but all I get are bugs?

Sonic brilliance detonates on CD racks

Does being a critic mean I have to hate something every now and then? Does it mean that I can't listen to a bunch of new releases and find something redeeming in every single one of them? Can I not review five albums and not like every single one of them? Well call me swell, because it happened.

Whipped Cream
Dali Records

Whipped Cream may be one of Sweden's best exports since the Swedish supergroup Abba. The quartet has a pretty ample fascination with the later, druggy Beatles. It takes a certain amount of chutzpah to cover "Come Together," but the concluding track of & other delights, Whipped Cream's debut release, is pulled off adroitly.

The other 10 tracks comprise a sonic trip of smooth production highlighted by "Let Us Try It Out," an extravaganza of mystical imagery. Only towards the end does the Whipped Cream formula wear a little thin as the crazy kids can't seem to lay off the effects pedals. Call up a few of your best Blue Meanie pals, drop a tab and get out the Whipped Cream. B

Puddin' EP
Bestkissersintheworld

These guys so underwhelmed me when I saw them open for Social Distortion last year that I used their set to beat the bathroom rush. Puddin' however is such a blazing five-pack that had I been wearing socks first time I listened to it, they not only would have smelled bad, they would have been knocked off.

BKITW employ a pretty simple formula of chord and tempo changes for an aural fiesta. If I could tell you what "Pickin' Flowers For" does for my adrenaline, you'd be pretty psyched for me.

Thanks to "Melanie," we have one of the year's best lyrics, "Melanie, if I had a dime for every time I said something stupid, I'd have sixty-three dollars to spend how I please." You can stop doing the math, it's 630 stupid things said. Your welcome. A-

Glazed
Mystery Machine
Nettwerk

I searched for a reason behind my infatuation with this stupendous debut. After all, I played the tape in my car for two weeks straight, delaying my review because it never left my tapedeck. The answer is Chilliwack, a city in British Columbia which, with all due respect, has the added appeal of sounding like a cartoon character or something obscene.

Apparently there isn't much to do in Chilliwack other than get high, get drunk, have sex and write really cool songs about it. Glazed is a flowing soundwave of an aesthetic pleasure which grunge has a tendency to trample. So rare is it these days that a new band can achieve such identity that it fits into the alternative niche so snugly while not emulating its predecessors, only calling upon them.

There is a healthy portion of Sonic Youth seen in the band's warbling guitars. Yet the Mystery Machine guitar sound is a truly unique twin guitar attack for a sound which they can truly call their own — sorta dreamy, sorta grungy, quite a mystery. "Everyone's Alright" is an astronomical triumph beginning in a faint Al Jourgenson growl before transforming into a distorted undulation of a chorus.

Luke Rogalsky's vocal restraint is a charm that never loses control. Something in that brisk Chilliwack air has bred one of the year's best new bands.

On the Cross of Commerce
Low Pop Suicide
Capitol Records

Low Pop Suicide's Rick Boston coughs out lyrics as if he were on the verge of death. "Oh the poor lad!" as my English mum would say. His effusion is a highly credible form of vehemence quite reminiscent of the Cult's Ian Anderson. Low Pop seeks to claim a spot in the rage field just without all the toys and fancy effects —straight bass, guitar and drums. Tracks like "Ride" wreak of Reznor-esque torment.

Meanwhile, Low Pop exhibits an eclectic voice on "Gimme, gimme," employing a strong and funky bassline while mocking greed. Others utilize power chords with a heavy backbeat to complement's Boston's

A classic Coppelia provides audience a welcome escape

New Zealand Ballet
Fine Arts Center
April 8, 1993

With the pressure and stress that so often accompanies the last month of the academic semester, a journey into the world of enchantment and fantasy may be just what some of us need to take our minds off of things. Few forms of entertainment can satisfy this need like that of the Romantic Ballet. The Royal New Zealand Ballet Company's presentation of the classic Coppelia last Thursday night at the Fine Arts Center did an exceptional job of achieving this.

Set in nineteenth century Poland, Coppelia tells the tale of Dr. Coppelius, a strange newcomer in town who devotes his life to creating life-life dolls. His favorite of these, Coppelia, is displayed on the balcony of his house, although passerbys mistake her for a real human.

One of these is a young woman named Swanilda, who is betrothed to a young man named Franz. Franz is mystified by the presence of this "woman" who rests on the balcony. Dr. Coppelius magically activates the doll's body parts to trick Franz into thinking that "she" is responding to his flirtation. Swanilda, although jealous, nonetheless invites Coppelia to join her and the other women, but soon comes to the realization that Coppelia is merely a doll.

That is, until Dr. Coppelius drugs Franz's drink, forcing him into a coma. He then transfers the young man's life force into the doll. Franz eventually awakens and reconciles with Swanilda, who pretends to "come to life" after having exchanged places with Coppelia. The ballet concludes in a celebration finale of the young couple's reconciliation.

The dancing, needless to say, was superb, combining good humor with traditional ballet form. The dancers' movements were playful and energetic yet they were also extremely light on their feet, making the ballet look effortless to perform.

In a particular scene in Act One, the dancers —

Everything Falls Apart and More
Hüsker Dü
Rhino

If you're talking about punk rock and the quintessential bands who helped to shape and chisel it, Hüsker Dü, the power trio from Minneapolis, absolutely must be mentioned. Hüsker Dü, whose name is pronounced "Whosker (rhymes with 'blur')-Doo", took their namesake from the German language and its expression 'Do you remember?' And with their records and their live performances, Hüsker Dü have left behind a legacy hard to forget.

The band existed from 1979, at the dawning age of the American punk rock scene, until 1987, when their drummer, Grant Hart, became so strung out on heroin that he couldn't be on time to a show if it was to save his life.

Alas, the band crumbled beneath rumors of Hart's drug addiction and lead singer and guitar player, Bob Mould's growing enthusiasm for a solo career. Sadly, Hüsker Dü, who after nine years seemed at the height of their popularity - poised for national attention, suddenly collapsed at the starting gate.

Fortunately, during the time period in which Hüsker Dü did exist, they successfully recorded and released some classic albums which have garnered much praise in the underground-alternative rock scene. Clearly, much of their material has had a dramatic influence on many of today's alternative bands.

Hüsker Dü did it first; their albums say it all. If you enjoy your guitar grunge with a tortured flair, Metal Circus is for you. If you'd like for your hardcore to be 'listener-friendly', Warehouse: Songs and Stories will surely meet your pop-rock needs.

But if you want to relive the terrifying topics of youth, like dating and rejection, thoughts of suicide, and high schools on fire then Zen Arcade is the masterpiece you need to pick up right away. It's the band's crowning achievement and there's not a bad song on it.

If you appreciate the energy and raw sound of a live show, Land Speed Record has got it. It's an on-stage recording of a 40 minute set of the band's original material which drills away like a mad dentist, never letting up for a second. It's the best live show ever to be captured on tape. With rebellious abandon, Hüsker Dü strikes back hard at American institution and industry with songs like "Guns at my School" and "Push the Button".

To its listener, Land Speed Record force feeds a horse-pill manifesto, attacking everything that's wrong about America. It delivers a heavy message, but before Hüsker Dü allow themselves to become too preachy, they skillfully laugh it all off with a cover version of the Gilligan's Island theme song, complete with the immortal chorus "I wanna [expletive] Ginger."

Along with their records, Hüsker Dü built a strong reputation on their gutsy and energetic live performances, which were always sure to include a lot of slam-dancing adolescents. Hüsker Dü's tightness as a band and freshness of sound (Oh the volume!) brought them heaps of praise both from their critics and their fans. It was always fun to watch the veins bulge on singer-guitarist Bob Mould's forehead when he played, and it is said that drummer Grant Hart would unintentionally break drum heads just from hitting them too hard. Indeed, Hüsker Dü had the intensity.

Okay, okay, so exactly what is the point of this history lesson? The point of all of this history about the now defunct Hüsker Dü is to call attention to a recent re-release of some hard to find, early career recordings by this highly original and talented punk rock trio.

The new issue of these remastered and remixed songs

See Malcolm X

Unforgiven may still be playing around town, soaking in its extra box-office after the Academy Awards, but there's a golden opportunity to catch the best film of 1992 in my opinion, Spike Lee's masterful Malcolm X.

The film, a chronicle of the late Black leader's life and times, will be shown tonight through Wednesday at 7 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium.

The screenings are sponsored by the Panhellenic Council, the UMass Pan-Hellenic Council and the UMass Black Student Union. Before each showing, there will be a faculty discussion.

Lee's best film to date is a superb exploration into the life of one man throughout his ever-evolving consciousness. Lee and longtime cinematographer Ernest Dickerson chose to shoot the movie in four different film styles, each adding a telling canvas for each period in Malcolm's life.

Denzel Washington was nominated for an Oscar for his work in the title role. He rounds out an excellent cast which includes Al Freeman, Jr., Angela Bassett, Delroy Lindo and Albert Hall.

Don't miss this chance to catch one of the 90's finest films on the big screen. Tickets are $3 and are available at TIX or at the door.

The Fluid
Hollywood Records

If a group's been doing what they do for quite some time, it's seldom a valid excuse for an uninspiring new release. But in the case of a band like The Fluid, an exception can be made. Their latest, purplemetalflakemusic, coalates one great track, three or four good ones and the rest are okay.

"7/14" employs a Mudhoney-esque superfuzz bass and buzzing feedback for a scorching product. The track is simply one of the coolest things the band's ever done. "Mister Blameshifter" plays some neat tricks with call and response and rocks a bit more than the others. To their credit, The Fluid is a classically tight unit with a hint of Mudhoney and more than a hint of older influences such as the Buzzcocks. The Fluid has influenced a good deal of what we hear today. B/C male as well as female — performed a "social"-type dance with all the comedy and heartiness of a folk dance all the grace and "style" of a traditional ballet. The men in particular were a delight, their gymnastic movements strong yet graceful. Gone were any traces of effeminacy that sometimes characterize the movements of male dancers.

The entire ballet was enthusiastically taken in by the nearly sold-out audience, but the rousing ending, the "Festival of the Bell" was the highlight for both the audience and the dancers. Comprised of five pieces, or "dances of the hours," it was met with almost continuous applause by the audience.

Coppelia was a wonderful breath of fresh air in the midst of the abstract, less structured modern dance revival that seems to be taking the dance world by storm. All in all, the ballet's true delight was in allowing its viewers to forget reality for a couple of hours and slip back to a period when it was okay to believe in the unreal.

is entitled Everything Falls Apart and More and it includes the obscure "Statues" single, the "In a Free Land" single and the 12 song EP Everything Falls Apart. All of its tracks were recorded before 1983, so you get the band in their rawest, most personable form.

Everything Falls Apart and More begins with the crack of a military drum roll and immediately we're swept into the spastic anthem "From the Gut", the album's first track. It surges at us, powered by bassist, Greg Norton's jerky bass line. With the second track we become witnesses to early eighties' punk rock, Minneapolis style, as Bob Mould screams "I can see your lips move but all I hear is blah-blah-blah."

"Punch Drunk" is a 30 second song that moves faster than a flaming shot and by the time it grinds to a halt, the room is spinning. Similarly, the fast and explosive "Bricklayer" hits you over the head and takes your wallet. You get the idea. It's only by the album's sixth track, a joke cover of the hippy Donovan's "Sunshine Superman," that the album's pace slows down enough to begin to see the variety that Hüsker Dü can achieve.

Hüsker Dü are not a band who always take themselves seriously. "Sunshine Superman" is Hüsker Dü's gastric belch at the sixties era. It comes at one like a dancing drunken bum whose most recent claim to fame is a successful soiling of his pants.

On the subsequent track, the choppy and poppy "Everything Falls Apart," we get an early sense of the kind of true songwriting skill Hüsker Dü possesses and stand poised to demonstrate on all of their later albums. Slacker (before it was cool to be) Bob Mould laconically sings the lyric "I got nothing to do/ I got nothing to say/ Everything is so [expletive] up I guess we like it that way."

You want personable? On "What Do I Want?" we're invited for a minute and a half inside a Grant Hart mental therapy session, as he torturously asks over and over "What'll make me happy?" Even the song "Amusement" which was recorded in 1980, with its fuzzy sound and its badly mixed instrumentation, conveys more 'raw feeling' than gets expressed by the majority of modern music today.

Hüsker Dü's music was powered by its authenticity. They were a garage band from Minneapolis who never forgot their middle-class upbringing. They wrote songs about their neighborhood, their girlfriends and getting drunk. The 19 song "Everything Falls Apart and More" as testament that Hüsker Dü were more than just contributors to the punk rock movement, they were its pioneers.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Finish a long-overdue assignment before starting something new. If you are turning 21 this week do not partake of sixteen shots-it could be a bad idea. You will be in the company of friends and you will like it. Trust your mate's judgment.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Backing for a business project is available, but there could be snags when dealing with a government office. Check out the details. Socializing is good for you.

GEMINI(May 21-June 20): A good day to build the foundation for a bright financial future. Protect your reputation as a person who looks ahead. Spend more time on your own doing creative work.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Your business and financial successes result in favorable references. A new source of income requires careful scrutiny. Review recent expenditures.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): You manage any new work deadlines and demands beautifully. Experts recommend a different investment plan; do what makes you feel most secure financially. Emphasize your leadership credentials.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): A domestic problem may have you feeling a little resentful. A younger member of the family tries to alleviate the tension. Sharing the credit at your place of employment encourages teamwork.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): A problem from the past crops up once again. Opinions vary as to what you should do. Take time out to smooth your mate's ruffled feathers. People at a distance offer encouraging advice.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Today starts out with a bang. Your business and finances enjoy favorable influences. Avoid involving prominent people in your personal affairs. Any arguments that arise can be easily settled.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): You are pulling out of a difficult phase. If others cannot help you, redouble your own efforts! The future looks brighter than ever. Keep your cool if a romance begins to heat up.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): The employment scene is hectic now. Stay calm and resist airing your frustrations. You win new prestige by expressing good will toward your coworkers.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Financial maneuvers require very careful handling. Impulse purchases could wreck your budget. Exercise greater self-control. What you desire can be obtained later.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Greater personal effort is necessary to get your ideas across. People close to you will be of little help; do not expect too much and you will not be disappointed. Persevere!

Red Sox off to a fresh start

New players, winning record set the mood for 1993

By HOWARD ULMAN
Associated Press

BOSTON – The Boston Red Sox, who open their home season today against the Cleveland Indians, have a new look. Fourteen of their players didn't start last season with the team.

Far from coincidentally, there's another drastic difference. For the first time since 1982, the Red Sox are coming off the road for their home opener with a winning record.

That was assured Saturday when they trampled the Texas Rangers 10-2. Improving their record to 4-1, best in the AL East just six months after they finished last in the division. Six of Boston's eight RBIs in that game were by players who were elsewhere in 1992's opening day.

Frank Viola wouldn't mind continuing the changes. He didn't get past the fourth inning in last season's home opening 8-6 loss to Baltimore, although reliever Tony Fossas was the loser.

"You'll see a lot of good games from me, trust me," Viola said after the game. "I'm not going to worry about when I did it. I just don't want to see it happen again soon."

He already is 1-0 this year and, on Monday, he gets his second opening start in two seasons with Boston, which has lost eight of its last 12 home openers.

"I'd like to show people what kind of pitcher I am and having been through it already is going to make it easier," said Viola, who allowed eight hits and five earned run averages at home last season.

Viola was outstanding in Boston's second game of the season, part of a three-game sweep in Kansas City that could take pressure off manager Butch Hobson. The Red Sox lost three of their first four games last season, all on the road.

"The positiveness has already been set," Viola said. "The key was to get out quick. That was our goal. ... There's a long way to go, but at least we showed we can do it."

This is the third straight year the Red Sox started on the road. They came home with a 2-3 mark in 1992. 1-2 in 1991 and 1-4 in 1989. They were 3-0 in 1990, the last time they began the season in Fenway Park.

It has been 11 years since Boston started with a winning road record. Against Baltimore, Dennis Eckerslay won the opener 2-0 and John Tudor won the third game 6-0. Despite the 2-1 start, they returned to their own ballpark and dropped their first four games.

The Red Sox have lost their last two home openers but won their second home game each year. They had won four of their previous five Fenway debuts.

In homeopeners, they are 51-41, 42-39 since they moved to Fenway, with three shutouts. Bruce Hurst has the last one in 1987.

Crowds have flocked for their first chance to see the home club. The smallest attendance in home openers since the Red Sox won the 1975 pennant was the very next season when they drew 32,127.

Another full house is expected Monday despite a forecast of intermittent rain under cloudy skies with a high temperature of 50.

Boston has opened its home season seven times against Cleveland, all since 1962, going 3-4.

This time, the Indians are trying to reconstruct a pitching staff in the wake of the deaths of Steve Olin and Tim Crews and the serious injury to former Boston pitcher Bob Ojeda, all in a spring training boating accident.

Cleveland signed lefty Matt Young, who was released in the spring after two poor seasons with Boston. He is working at the team's minor-league field. In Boston's fourth game last year, at Cleveland, Young pitched eight hitless innings but didn't get credit for a no-hitter in the Indians 2-1 win because Cleveland didn't have to bat in the bottom of the ninth.

His departure was part of the massive overhaul on the Red Sox. The only current players who were on the roster at the start of last season are Viola, Clemens, Danny Darwin, Joe Hesketh, Greg Harris, Fossas, Tony Pena, Mo Vaughn, Luis Rivera, Scott Cooper and Mike Greenwall.

Brown leads the way to Red Sox loss, 4-1

By ARNIE STAPLETON
Associated Press

ARLINGTON, Texas – Kevin Brown came off the disabled list Sunday and held the Red Sox to five hits over seven 2-3 innings as Texas beat Boston 4-1.

Brown walked one and struck out four in his first appearance since March 16. Mo Vaughn's fourth-inning homer was the only run off the Rangers' ace.

Brown, who tied Toronto's Jack Morris for the major league lead with 21 victories last season, missed his opening day start with a rib fracture. He went on the DL for the first time in his career and was activated just before the game.

He was sharp Sunday, getting 16 groundball outs before Tom Henke replaced him with two on and two out in the eighth. Henke finished for his third save.

Ivan Rodriguez broke a 1-1 tie in the sixth with a bloop single that scored Julio Franco, who led off with a double off Danny Darwin, who gave up five hits in six innings.

Texas, which stranded eight runners, got its first run when Dean Palmer doubled off the wall in right-center leading off the second inning, advanced on a single by Rodriguez and scored on Doug Strange's sacrifice fly.

Vaughn tied it in the fourth when he hit a ball just over the 330-foot sign in left field.

A diving Benji Gil got Brown out of a first-and-third jam in the fifth when he grabbed Mike Greenwall's hard grounder up the middle and flipped to second for the force.

Brown got two quick outs in the eighth inning before he hit Billy Hatcher with a fastball and gave up an infield single to Mike Greenwall. After Henke relieved, Andre Dawson grounded out to Palmer.

Palmer hit a two-run homer in the eighth off Greg Harris.

Mariners find success in R.I.

Providence Bruins tackle Springfield in AHL play-offs

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) — A year ago, owner Ed Anderson and his Maine Mariners were packing their bags after a miserable American Hockey League season that left them out of the play-offs and out of favor with their fans.

Today, after a move south, Anderson and his Providence Bruins are ready to face the Springfield Indians in a best-of-seven play-off series after finishing first in the AHL's North Division with a league-leading 9,000-plus fans a game.

"You couldn't write a better script," Anderson said of the Bruins' inaugural season.

"We take great pride in what's happened here, in terms of both hockey and being part of the city's renaissance," said Anderson. "I've been saying all along that it's a great hockey town."

The play-offs begin Monday at the Providence Civic Center. The Bruins are among the contenders for the AHL's Calder Cup, which has not been in Rhode Island since the Providence Reds won the league championship in 1956.

As of Thursday, 7,000 tickets had been sold for each of the first and second games of the division semifinals in Providence.

"When we opened up the box office for play-off tickets, there were six lines of people waiting," said Anderson. "We sold 400 in the first hour."

The Bruins took 10 of 14 games from the fourth place Indians this season. But the seven played at the Civic Center were each decided by a single goal.

Springfield's team also will be bolstered by players who will be sent down from their NHL affiliate, Hartford, which did not qualify for post-season play.

The added firepower of the NHL-caliber players has the Bruins concerned.

"That's a third of their team," said Providence coach Mike O'Connell. "I've told the guys. I think the first series will be the toughest. We're not taking anyone lightly."

The Bruins have played well in big games, but O'Connell warned the play-offs often produce surprises.

"You never have an indication of how a team is going to come out," he said. "Play-offs are a whole different ball game with a whole differendt intensity level."

O'Connell said that, while defense is often paramount in the post-season, he won't hold the Bruins back from their freewheeling style.

"We're an offensive team," he said of his squad which averaged nearly five goals per game. "If you play that way, the right way, you can be successful. We've proven that."

The Bruins' offense may be hindered by the absence of the high-scoreers Andrew McKim, Tim Sweeney and Serpei Zholtok, who were all called up to Boston to help the NHL club in their play-offs.

Providnce team officials said late last week that it was uncertain whether any would return.

Anderson said that, from a business standpoint, the Bruins first season in Providence was a success, no matter what the outcome of the play-offs.

Baseball loses three straight to Rutgers

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Good Friday wasn't very good for the University of Massachusetts baseball team, and Saturday was mostly unholy.

The Minutemen went into the Friday-Saturday series with Atlantic 10 rival Rutgers University hoping for the best, but the Scarlet Knights swept the Minutemen 8-6, 12-3 and 10-6 in the three game set.

Saturday's game could be described as a pitching duel turned slugfest. UMass freshman Peter Lucido and Phil Schneider of Rutgers both sat down the first nine men they faced. Schneider had four strikeouts through three, with Lucido whiffing four through three and one third. It was in the fourth that Lucido lost his mastery of the opposing hitters and the Minutemen fell apart.

Mike Higgins, Mike Winchock and Scott Kassan hit three singles in a row before designated hitter Mike Lukacs belted a grand slam off Lucido to put Rutgers up 4-0.

Bill Knight countered in the bottom of the inning for UMass, slugging a three-run dinger to cut the lead to one. When Rutgers put another four runs on the board in the sixth, the Minutemen came back with three more again.

Greg LaRocca's first homer of the year, a two-run shot, capped the UMass offense for the day and brought UMass within two, 8-6. Rutgers added a run in the eighth and one more in the ninth to close the books.

"It's very frustrating for me and it's definitely frustrating for the team," said catcher Jeff January. "It's always one inning that kills us. We're not that far away, it's not that we can't hit, things just aren't clicking, we just have to keep plugging."

UMass' number one and number two starters, Jeff Toothaker and Jim Telgheder, were both ineffectual on Friday, and Mike Barckley (3-3) and Neil Iovero (3-1) picked up the wins for the Scarlet Knights in the doubleheader.

In the first game, Rutgers right fielder Doug Alongi went 4-for-4 with four runs scored, an RBI, a double and a triple. The Minutemen hit the ball well but could not come back from a big deficit.

Left fielder Justin Howard hit two home runs and had 3 RBI, but it wasn't enough. At one point, Rutgers led 8-2 and Toothaker (3-3) was still in the ballgame, as Stone wanted to conserve his young bullpen.

Friday's second game was over pretty quick, although UMass led 2-0 after one on a Jeff January two-run dinger. Rutgers tied it with two in the third and blew UMass out with 10 in the fourth.

All 10 runs were unearned, although Rutgers had eight hits to go along with Minuteman miscues. Scott Kassan and Mike Lukacs both hit smashes in the inning, accounting for five of the 10 runs.

Iovero allowed only two runs on three hits, and struck out nine in the complete game. UMass head coach Mike Stone said he thought his team did not play hard at the end of the blowout, and said he was displeased.

"I thought we died a little at the end of the game, which we didn't do [Saturday]," said Stone. "We just have to stick together and hang with it."

"Rutgers is a tough team, a big rival, so it's tough losing to them here at home," said Howard. "A base hit here and a base hit there, we could have taken the lead this weekend. We have three or four more weekends, so we have to come up with some wins against Temple and URI.

"It's not as fun as last year," said Howard. "Usually it's fun when you win. Right now, it's just frustrating."

The University of Massachusetts baseball team had a rough weekend on the mound, as they allowed a combined 30 runs in three games.

The Minutemen's bats were alive in the series, but it was not enough to win a game. Justin Howard had two home runs in Friday's first game.

Women's gym heads to NIT for season finale

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

After travelling the long and winding road of an entire collegiate season, the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team takes to the mat for the final time tonight at Southeast Missouri State University for the National Invitational Tournament For Women's Gymnastics.

Heading into the NIT, the Minutewomen are going to try to represent gymnastics in the Northeast, according to head coach Alfie Mitchell. Mitchell said he would like nothing more than to prove that the teams in the Northeast are underscored compared to those in other parts of the country.

"What makes the NIT so interesting is the teams that are going to be in it, most of which we've never seen," said Mitchell. "We'll see how we compare to other squads across the country, and if these teams are getting overscored."

The eight-team field, along with UMass, contains three teams that will be represented at the NCAA Nationals. Auburn University, No. 6 in the country, will bring its entire team to the Nationals.

Boise State, Michigan State, Illinois State, University of Iowa, University of New Hampshire and host Southeast Missouri State fill out the rest of the meet.

UMass is entering the meet relaxed and seems to be ready to go, according to Mitchell. However, he said he hopes it is not the calm before the storm.

"We're going into this thing with the right attitude, because you've got to be very relaxed," said Mitchell. "If you haven't done it up until now, it's not going to miraculously show up.

"Right now, one would say they're too relaxed. But when meet time comes around, tension always filters in, so we'll probably come out just right."

The UMass gymnasts have realized that it is the last meet of their long season, and they have come to the end of the road. For two of the seniors, Abby May and Lisa-Beth Cronen, tonight's meet means the end of a career.

"I just want to do well so I can go out on a good note," said Cronen. "I'm sure I'll probably be a little sad afterwards, but right now I'm excited. It is a big meet and it should be fun."

Tammy Marshall, the other member of Mitchell's terrific trio of seniors, will compete in the Nationals this upcoming weekend. As individuals and as a team, the Minutewomen had their own way of looking at the season finale.

"Hopefully we can pull together as a team, because everyone's excited. You get tired as the season goes on, but because it's our last meet, I think everyone will get up for it," said sophomore Erica Baum.

"I want us to have a good showing so in the future they can get invited back to the NIT because it is an honor," said May.

"This last meet makes me realize how much I'm going to miss Abby. She's my mentor and I look up to her, and I'm gonna miss her," said freshman Leann Zavotka.

"The most important thing is having a good time [at the NIT], pulling together, and doing the best we can. Whatever happens, happens," said Marshall.

NATO planes patrol airspace above Bosnia

By JOHN DANISZEWSKI
Associated Press

SARAJEVO — NATO warplanes patrolled above an overcast Bosnia on Monday to begin enforcing a U.N. no-fly zone in the first flexing of the alliance's military muscle outside its territory.

Among the planes was a French Mirage 2000 that went down in the Adriatic Sea, Pentagon sources said. The USS Roosevelt aircraft carrier launched a search mission for the pilot, said the sources, speaking on the condition of anonymity.

The flights were meant to impress Bosnian Serbs of new resolve to enforce U.N. resolutions meant to end Bosnia's civil war.

Operation Deny Flight had more political than military significance. The year-long war has primarily been fought with artillery, tanks and infantry. NATO pilots were under strict orders to shoot only as a last resort.

Bosnian Serbs bombarded the besieged eastern town of Srebrenica with renewed ferocity Monday. U.N. officials said at least 56 people died in an hour-long barrage.

Government scientists ordered to cease study

By JEFF DONN
Associated Press

Two government scientists who accused a biographer of Abraham Lincoln of plagiarism were ordered to drop their work because it overstepped their department's duties, an official said Monday.

The move against Dr. Ned Feder and Walter Stewart, two scientists at the National Institutes of Health, followed their accusations of plagiarism against Stephen B. Oates, a University of Massachusetts historian who wrote With Malice Toward None, a one-volume biography of Abraham Lincoln.

Oates vigorously denied the charges.

Feder and Stewart were assigned to new duties at their unit, the National Institute of Diabetes and Digestive and Kidney Diseases, beginning May 1, according to that department's spokeswoman, Betsy Singer.

"The work they've been doing over the last several years. . . including their plagiarism analysis, has progressively moved outside of the mission, responsibility and authority" of their unit, Singer said from the Institutes' headquarters in Bethesda, Md.

The two scientists, who learned of the transfers Friday, protested Monday in an agency memo. "We have no prior experience, competence or interest in the jobs to which we have been assigned," they wrote.

The two scientists, whose investigations have probed federally funded research, said they believe their transfers violate federal law protecting workers who expose waste of public money. Feder said they hope to reverse the transfers without resorting to a formal appeal.

Over the last 10 years, Feder, a physi-

Opposition calls for demonstrations

By TOM COHEN

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Opposition groups called for widespread demonstrations and a one-day strike in Johannesburg over the assassination of popular black leader Chris Hani, but leaders also urged calm Monday.

Police, meanwhile, said they found a suspected "hit list" of politicians and several guns in the home of the white man suspected in the slaying.

In the Katlehong black township outside Johannesburg, protesting youths burned a house and several vehicles and shots were fired at police and journalists.

Police Warrant Officer Andy Pieke said officers fired rubber bullets to disperse a crowd. No injuries were reported and most of the shooting, including bursts of automatic gunfire, appeared to be in the air.

Protests occurred in a few other areas, but most parts of South Africa had little reaction to Saturday's killing of Hani, the Communist Party leader whose militant opposition to white minority rule won him wide respect from blacks.

Hani, 50, was perhaps the most popular leader of the African National Congress after its president, Nelson Mandela. His killing triggered fears of an angry backlash that could threaten talks between black and white leaders on ending apartheid, but government and ANC leaders said they were determined to press ahead with talks.

The ANC, the white-led government and other groups appealed for protesters to remain peaceful.

Economist calls for U.S. to help other nations

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

The United States has failed to provide adequate support to the former Soviet Union and developing nations in their transition to a market economy, according to reknowned economist John Kenneth Galbraith.

Galbraith, professor emeritus of economics at Harvard University, spoke a group of approximately 200 University of Massachusetts students about the role of the United States in the global economy last night.

Galbraith, who served as ambassador to India under John F. Kennedy from 1961 to 1963 and as deputy administrator in the Office of Price Administration under Franklin D. Roosevelt in the early 1940s, said economically, the world is divided into three parts. These parts are the developing nations, the slightly more advanced nations and the Western, industrialized countries.

Galbraith said many of the poor countries were set free from their colonial rulers after World War II when they became less economically attractive to the European nations.

"These countries were left with the most demanding task of our time," Galbraith said. "To establish a stable, efficient, democracy that can promote economic development. Nothing destroys economic progress more than a corrupt, totalitarian government."

Galbraith said in these underdeveloped countries, too much money has been spent on industrialization and not enough money on education and "personal development."

"Education is the first priority for economic progress," Galbraith said. "No literate population is poor, and no illiterate population is anything but poor."

Galbraith said in the poor countries of the world, agricultural prices have been kept low to satisfy the "urban proletariat." He said this lack of a stable agricultural policy has resulted in the discouragement of agriculture, underproduction and hunger.

Galbraith then turned his attention to the former Soviet Union's transition from "comprehensive socialism" to a market economy.

"[The former Soviet Union's] change to a market economy is the most dangerous and misguided transition in history," Galbraith said. "The Soviet Union has gone from a poorly working economic system to no system at all."

Galbraith said the former Soviet Union has plunged into a market economy when it should have been entering gradually. The result, he said, has been deprivation and hardship.

Galbraith also criticized the United States and Japan for not aiding the Republic sufficiently. He suggested the United States could use the money it spends on "exotic" weapons to buy food and medicine for the Russian people.

Galbraith blamed the current economic problems in

Roadwork beginning at UMass

UMass is planning to fund an $800,000 project to improve the road conditions down near Eastman Lane, the road running east and west between North Pleasant and East Pleasant streets.

The entire street will be resurfaced and rebanked in several areas. A new right-hand turning lane will be installed going into Eastman Lane and several intersections will be straightened or redesigned. Parking lot 43 will be enlarged by 50 spaces.

Also, the Totman building and the sidewalk leading to the Sylvan living complex will be made handicapped accessible.

The project will begin April 15 and will run until mid-August. The construction will be undertaken by Aquadro & Cerruti contractors of Northampton.

Professor honored for nature writing

Vincent G. Dethier, Gilbert Woodside Professor of Biology at UMass, has received the John Burroughs Medal for Distinguished Nature Writing for his book Crickets and Katydids, Concerts and Solos.

The John Burroughs Association is headquartered at the American Museum of Natural History and gives out the award for scientific accuracy, firsthand fieldwork and creative natural history writing.

Dethier is primarily a neurophysiologist but has also worked in the fields of entomology, ecology, behavior and biochemistry.

He has been a faculty member since 1975 and is a member of the National Academy of Science, the American Academy of Arts and Sciences and the American Philosophical Society.

Art History symposium scheduled

There will be a symposium on art history held on April 16 and 17 at UMass. Alumni from the master's program in art history will be on hand to discuss current issues in their work. The Friday session will feature museum and gallery curators and will be followed by a reception in the University Gallery titled "Alumni III." The Saturday program features panelists working in academia. The symposium is free and open to the public.

UMass Mathematicians in Germany

Bennett spoke on orthoalgebras and Janowitz spoke on the compatability of cluster methods with isotone mappings. UMass senior mathematics major Dana Fabri attended the conference. Bennett also gave a colloquium at the University of Bern, Switzerland on tensor products of orthoalgebras.

Profs in ethnic population conference

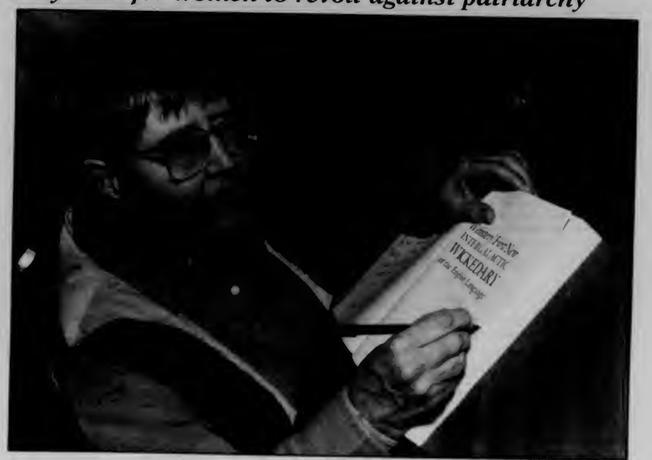
Sociology professors Gordon F. Sutton and Roland Chilton will speak on "Minority Counts and Minority Preferences" at the Census Bureau's Research Conference on Undercounted Ethnic Populations. The conference will be held in Virginia in May.

Sutton has been a faculty member since 1969. He received his bachelor's and master's degrees from Wayne State University and his doctoral from the University of Michigan.

Chilton received his bachelor's from Monmouth College, his master's from the University of Wisconsin and his doctoral degree from Indiana University. He has been a faculty member since 1970.

Feminist redefines language

Daly calls for women to revolt against patriarchy



MATT KAHN / COLLEGIAN

Radical feminist Mary Daly

By MELANIE DESILVA
Collegian Staff

Giving a humorous, yet philosophical lecture and reading from her latest book, Outercourse, radical feminist lesbian philosopher Mary Daly called for women to "sin against the biggest religion in the universe — patriarchy."

Some of Daly's statements included, "Anita Hill was 'the victim of a high-tech lynching,'" "the father, son and holy ghost are f——g and raping women and they won't win," and "There's no other place logical to be other than radical feminism."

Daly, a radical feminist lesbian philosopher with a Ph.D. in theology and philosophy from a Switzerland university, sent a powerful and booming message Friday night to approximately 350 people in the Student Union Ballroom.

A professor of feminist ethics at Boston College, Daly has contributed to the field of gynocentric philosophy with a myriad of past publications, such as The Church and the Second Sex, Beyond God the Father, Gyn/Ecology, Pure Lust and Webster's First New Intergallactic Wickedary of the English Language.

According to Daly, most women are constrained to the "foreground" of life, which acts as a facade and barrier to rediscovering their power and autonomy as women.

"The foreground is a film over everything which must be dispelled," Daly said.

Women must fight against this "gynocidal" foreground, and leap into a "background" of self consciousness, and resistance, according to Daly.

Daly called herself and other women who are struggling against men to reach the background, pirates. With her writings and teachings, Daly said she has "plundered away from the phallocentric thieves."

She also said all women pirates "steal back righteously what belong to us."

Yet, despite the philosophical seriousness of the presentation, Daly sparkled with humor, reading from Webster's New Intergallactic Wickedary of the English Language to initially spark the audience's attention

Daly read mainstream, stuffy dictionary definitions of words like dyke, wild, dick, broom and fundamentalist, clapping her hands above her head and making seal

Health Services review makes slow progress

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL

Reviewing the pulse of the University of Massachusetts Health Services has been taking months, according to several outside consultants who have undertaken this project for the University.

Just ask Stephen Beckley and Stephen Blom of Beckley Associates, who flew in from Colorado last, to meet for the third time with students, faculty and staff at the University as part of their Health Services review, which will be coming out by the semester's end.

"We have not put a single pen to paper yet, but I have strong feelings about the review," Beckley said Friday while taking time out for a brief interview during their busy schedule. "I'd say we have met 200 to 250 students total."

Last week, Beckley and Blom went on three campus tours, in addition to meeting with students in George Washington Tower and John Quincy Adams Tower last Thursday night.

"We started at 21 floor and worked down and talked with over 100 students," Beckley said.

In addition to examining the basic and supplemental student health insurance, Beckley said they have been reviewing the health situation off campus; Beckley Associates have been evaluating what is going on healthwise in Massachusetts and on college campuses across the nation.

Beckley Associates, a private consulting firm, have also reviewed the health services of University of New

Group examines assault dangers

By KENDRA WILLETT

Because of the potential dangers of sexual assault faced by women, a Canadian group has taken action which may provide an example for Americans, according to a speaker yesterday.

Connie Guberman, a women's studies professor at the University of Toronto, was invited to the University of Massachusetts by Robert Schwartzwald, the Canadian Studies program director for the Five College area.

Schartzwald stressed to an audience of approximately 19 men and women the importance of bringing Canadians and Americans together, especially on issues like sexual assault towards women.

Due to an increase of rapes and murders during the 1980's the Metro Council in Canada decided it was time for a change.

The Metro Action Committee on Public Violence against Women and Children (METRAC) formed in 1984, promotes the rights of women and children to live free from violence and threats of violence.

"A common thread among women is the experience of fear," Guberman said. "Parking lots, parking garages, streets and elevators are all common areas of concern."

According to Guberman, METRAC has designed a way of using women's experience to assess safety and security concerns in a specific area — through a women's safety audit.

During an audit of a particular area, five or six people walk around areas such as a building, parking lot, or a park, and questions are asked such

Yeltsin seeks national support as referendum date draws near

By SERGEI SHARGORDSKY
Associated Press

MOSCOW — Hitting the campaign trail two weeks before the referendum on his leadership, President Boris Yeltsin urged his countrymen on Monday to support him and endorse the "new Russia" and its post-Communist reforms.

Yeltsin's speech to Moscow students was part of a campaign swing this week to rally popular support before the referendum. The April 25 vote is aimed at resolving the power struggle between the president and the hard-line Congress.

"We must defend the course for reforms together," Yeltsin told about 1,500 people at the Moscow Aviation Institute. "I hope you have made your choice to support a new Russia."

"In order to act more decisively. I must have support of the electorate in this critical moment. All together, we must make this decisive choice," Yeltsin said describing the referendum as his "last reserve."

On Tuesday, Yeltsin plans to take his campaign to the Kuznetsk Basin, Russia's largest coal deposit and the center of strikes that shook the Soviet Union in 1989 and 1991.

The referendum, approved last month by the Congress of People's Deputies, will ask Russians whether they have confidence in Yeltsin and if they support his painful economic reforms. It also asks if they favor early presidential and parliamentary elections.

The communist-dominated Congress elected before the Soviet Union collapsed in 1991 opposes Yeltsin's free market drives and has been steadily eroding his powers.

Yeltsin said the real choice faced by Russians was not "between the Congress and the president" but whether to "surrender to those who want to roll back, who are ready to put an end to reforms and therefore to Russia."

Yeltsin said the reforms have prevented an agricultural collapse brought consumer goods to once barren shelves and created hundreds of thousands of private farms and more than 60,000 private enterprises.

"The fight against inflation is our main task now. We know how to solve this problem," he said.

Yeltsin claimed the monthly inflation rate dropped to 17 percent in March from 27 percent in January. He also said the fall in industrial output was slowing.

Poet talks on peace images

DIANA D'AVANZO
Collegian Staff

"Peace cannot easily be dealt with except in contrast with war," said a noted poet at a reading Thursday in the Converse Assembly Room at Amherst College.

Anthony Hecht's readings were broken into two parts. The first half of the night dealt with war, the second half with peace.

The first piece of work he recited was "More Light, More Light" which, Hecht explained, "encapsulates a story taken from a book by a concentration camp survivor."

Hecht's next poem "The Room," was "a prayer" that looked back on 20 years since the concentration camps.

The poem "The Room" begins with what is the beginning of a prayer — "Millions, Father, millions have come to this great path," and goes on to describe the horror of the gas chamber, "We start to panic, to claw at each other. . ."

Hecht went on to read other war poems including "Persistences" and "Venetian Vespers." Hecht explained he did not write in protest about the war.

"I believe when you're writing a poem of that kind you attract attention to yourself and your high moral standards," Hecht said.

The next part of Hecht's readings dealt with peace. "Praise for Colonus," "Apprehensions" and "The Lull" were three of the poems included in this section. Hecht explained that "the lull spoken of is the lull before a storm."

Over 150 people gathered for Hecht's reading, which was part of the series titled "Imaging Peace: The Corliss Lamont Arts Project." The project is a year-long Amherst College series supported by the Corliss Lamont Lectureship for a Peaceful World.

Hecht received the Pulitzer Prize in 1968 for his collection "The Hard Hours." Hecht is a professor in the Graduate School of Georgetown University.

Mr. Miyaghi would approve: taking a self-defense class

Stephanie EISENBERG

I confess, I'm a karate disaster. I pity my instructors because they have to put up with me three times a week. I signed up for karate with high hopes, believing that by the end of the semester, I too would be a karate kid. At the rate I'm going, I'll be lucky if I finish the class with some of my dignity still intact. Unfortunately, that's not looking very likely at this point in time.

While Mr. Miyaghi won't be taking me on as his next protege, I am taking karate for a reason: women need to learn self-defense. In this violent day and age, women must learn how to protect themselves. Since violent crime is on the rise, then defense mechanisms must be too.

Even as a little girl, I was taught that nice girls don't fight. And until I left my peaceful Long Island suburb to come to UMass, I never thought I would need to learn how. But reality kicked in, and I realized that I knew absolutely nothing about protecting myself — and then I was scared.

My dorm friends may remember my first attempt to protect myself: a plastic whiffleball bat. While this tool helped me to successfully drive pestering friends from my room, I now have serious doubts as to its effectiveness in a real situation. I then decided to go with the old keychain approach. So, I loaded onto my keychain a flashlight, a pocket knife and a whistle.

While all are good ideas, and possibly could help in a dangerous situation, this semester the lock on my door is a combination lock, eliminating the need for me to carry a key. At this point I realized that I needed to know a little self defense — hence my bouts with karate.

I was tired of feeling helpless and defenseless, and I realized that I was the only one who could change that. I was scared and I really wasn't sure what I could do to change that.

Karate was the perfect solution. I am not a violent person; violence terrifies me, otherwise I would have put mace on my keychain. Karate is a peaceful sport that trains you to attack only if attacked. It trains you to be prepared for an attack, how to look out for one, and how to counterattack. It is also a beautiful sport with many graceful movements (hence my recurring trouble with it!).

Violent crime is definitely on the rise, even here at UMass. There have been more senseless attacks, more date rapes and more assaults on women than there have been in years past. Yet as a society at large, we choose to ignore it, again taking the old "it can't happen to me" approach. Maybe it won't, hopefully it won't, but it can and it might — so why not be a little prepared? I may be a karate failure, but there are some people in my class who after one semester are ready to train for their green belt, and can definitely protect themselves in some situations.

UMass offers a variety of classes in self-defense, ranging from karate to tai kwon do, to a self-defense class for women. Each teaches a different style of defense, and each is an art form in itself.

These classes offer something to everyone, male or female. They teach a certain sense of self-discipline, as well as offer defense and fighting techniques. The most important thing is that they all teach basically the same approach: never attack unless first attacked. This reigning principle is the guiding force within karate.

It is so important in this day and age for women to learn how to protect themselves. Self-defense is becoming an important survival tool, especially for women. Karate is the perfect way for woman to protect themselves without the use of violence. Women need to know what to do in case of an attack; before this class, I had absolutely no idea. I encourage all women to take at least one martial arts class at UMass before they graduate from this "safe" haven and move on to the "real world."

Clinton's jobs bill is just 'real sad'

This opinion is from the politically right and regards the Associated Press article, "Jobs bill still stuck in Senate stalemate" [Collegian, April 6].

The article, with great thoroughness, described the jobs bill standoff and GOP filibustering. However, it gave little to no insight to the reasons for the standoff.

The article quoted President Clinton as saying, "In a time when no new jobs are being created. . . it means that for political purposes, [the Republicans] are willing to deny jobs to places like Baltimore, Dallas, Houston, Pittsburgh and Philadelphia and Cleveland and Seattle. It's just real sad."

Here's what is real sad: during a national press conference March 23, Clinton was asked about the alleged needless spending (pork) that was part of the jobs bill. He responded, "You will read those bills for years in vain and not find those projects." He continued to say he would not let absurd spending happen.

It's real sad that President Clinton, lacking all integrity, has lied to the American public for political reasons, living up to his nickname, "Slick."

Here are just a few examples of what the Emergency Stimulus Jobs Package contains:

- $1 million for a cemetery in Puerto Rico.
- $5 million for a sports recreation complex in Puerto Rico.
- $3.5 million to preserve a theatre in Phoenix.
- $3.2 million to renovate a swimming pool in Spokane, Washington. Democratic Speaker of the House Thomas Foley lives in Spokane. Coincidence? I don't think so.
- $28 million to forgive the District of Columbia's debt.
- $3.2 million for compiling fish atlases. What is a fish atlas?
- $47 million for Human Reliability Assessment and Enhancement.
- $500,000 for a golf course in Florida.
- $19 million to be given to an agency for overseas vaccinations.
- $500,000 for replacing circuit breakers in the rest rooms.
- $4 billion for extending unemployment benefits. This pays people not to work.

It has been estimated that this jobs package will create 219,000 jobs. Divide this by the cost, $16.3 billion, and it will cost America $75,000 for each job created. This is not efficient.

It's real sad that our illustrious caring leader believes this is the way to create jobs. It is real sad that the Republicans don't want hard-earned tax dollars spent on such frivolous projects as studying river populations of the sickle fin chub.

Silence won't end harassment

I have heard tons of stories about sexual harassment of women. Though I am not the one who gets hurt, I am angered by these stories. There are two parts to my anger. One, it is anger with those who harass, for their cruelty to the feelings of another human. Two, I am angry because these cases of sexual harassment can only be heard among intimate friends, not in front of police officers or the public.

I can guess why these cases are not reported. Maybe it hurts so much that survivors just want to erase it from their memories, or they blame themselves for bringing about the incident. The police would not believe them or it is too minor and no one would care. I understand the pain sexual harassment causes, but I ask you two questions: Does anyone have a right to hurt you? Why does sexual harassment exist?

From my own point of view, to a large extent it is because of the silence of the survivors. Your silence extends your suffering to the generations after you, holding back the voices of people who suffer the same predicament as you, as they all think they are alone and weak, and that no one cares. At the same time, your silence strengthens the beliefs and confidence of those who harass you. So for these cruel beasts, "no" means "yes" and they think, "No one would report me to the police, not even the one I harass. Just do it." If we go on in silence, one day there would be no more voices for justice to be heard in this world as we might think that sexual harassment of women was a routine of life.

Maybe you are not sure about the outcome of speaking up, but to change the current status, we must at least talk about it instead of participating in the construction of myths by being silent and leading our offspring to live in a more and more unequal and threatening world. Everyone should have the right to feel very comfortable and safe to go everywhere in this world. However, in the present situation, this right is not given and it is something to struggle for.

To those horny attackers: imagine how you would feel if your mom, sister or girlfriend were harassed or raped by someone. What would you feel? Would you just take it for granted? If your answer is "yes," you are doomed. Does a female being flirtatious mean that you can harass her? No, you don't have such a right — no one does.

Guys, don't feel offended by me. I do not generalize that "all guys harass women." Let's endorse our female counterparts in getting rid of the "bad ones" in our family and combat the issue together.

I can't see Cyr as the good guy

I don't know if anyone else has heard of the press conference about James Cyr being a good guy, good father and sweet person. It may be true that he hasn't been found guilty as of yet, but everything pretty much points to him as being the murderer. That's not the point. The point is a woman, a 21-year-old woman, has been stabbed and her house has been burned down — she has been murdered.

I have heard this public announcement twice and after hearing it both times I have felt enraged because everyone is always trying to protect the perpetrator who more often than not is a man. A life has been taken away and all these people can think or talk about is how good James Cyr is. Where is the justice in this? I'm sure that if a man had been murdered by a woman, the woman wouldn't be held in such a positive light. She would be seen as a psychopath.

To the people who are praising James Cyr on that announcement, and wherever, I think you need to think about what you're saying. This shows insensitivity and disgust and plain ignorance on your behalf.

Can a planet be destroyed, please?

I remember waking up at six in the morning on Saturdays in 1983 to catch "Force Five" on channel 25. Like it was yesterday, I can see the credits at the beginning and the short scene clips and trying to figure out if I had seen a particular one. I remember watching "Star Blazers," "SuperFriends," "Spiderman and his Amazing Friends," "Force Five" and "The Incredible Hulk." Then there were "Kung Fu Theater" and "Creature Double Feature." These were the programs that kept me in the house even if my friends went to play ball in the park or to tell jokes on the porch or to spend a week at Disneyland.

Where did all these quality programs go? Nowadays we are stuck with the likes of "Widget the World Watcher," "Captain Planet" and "G.I. Joe." These shows are, in a word, weak. There is always someone trying to save the world from evil (O.K. I can understand that) while not hurting anyone else (???). How is it that no one in "G.I. Joe" ever gets hurt or killed? They always manage to eject just seconds before the missile hits the plane?

On all these shows disaster is averted in the nick of time. Can I see a planet destroyed for no other reason but sheer malice once? I don't advocate unnecessary violence (too much), but damn, enough is enough.

I beseech you, the public, bring back the Electron Chain and Grandizer Gooo!, Godzilla and the Shaolin Temple Monks. Bring back what made cartoons worth watching for a change.

Two whites were burned to death Sunday in a black township near Cape Town and another white injured in the attack died in a hospital Monday. But police said both those killings appeared related to violence over control of area bars.

An ANC statement on Monday condemned revenge violence against whites and called for residents of black townships to allow journalists to work freely. It said a committee with representatives of the ANC, its allies, police and a peace group had been set up to monitor violence in the Johannesburg area.

The ANC and its allies outlined plans for demonstration Tuesday, urged blacks to stay away from work in Johannesburg on Wednesday and set protest marches Saturday in the Johannesburg area. Memorial services were also scheduled for Wednesday in cities and towns throughout the country.

Allied planes are policing Bosnia from bases in Italy across the Adriatic. Two U.S. Air Force f-15 jet fighters, two French Mirage 2000s and two Dutch F-16s flew the first mission. AWACs surveillance planes manned by multinational crews and Navy jets on the Roosevelt are participating.

NATO officials declined to discuss specifically how violators would be dealt with. They said previously that NATO pilots would try to order violators back home or force them to land. Shooting down violators would be the last resort.

There were no reports of the NATO planes confronting any aircraft on Monday.

One of the Pentagon sources said the French plane went down about 15 miles off the coast of former Yugoslavia and another said "there was no hostile action involved." The French Defense Ministry in Paris had no immediate comment.

The show of international will to end the war took a step back Monday when the U.N. Security Council decided to postpone a vote on tightening economic sanctions on Serb-dominated Yugoslavia.

A Western diplomat at U.N. headquarters in New York said Russia asked that the vote be held after Russians vote in an April 25 referendum on President Boris Yeltsin's leadership.

The sanctions are to be tightened to force Serbia to pressure its Bosnian Serb allies to accept a peace plan already signed by their Muslim and Croat rivals.

Russian Foreign Minister Andrei Kozyrey said the delay would give the Serbs a "last chance" to agree to peace. He also said that if the two-week-old Bosnian cease-fire did not generally hold, the Security Council would have to resort to "most decisive measures."

The two used computer software they developed, dubbed the "plagiarism machine," to uncover hundreds of instances of alleged theft of phrases from previous sources in Oates' biographies of Lincoln, Martin Luther King and writer William Faulkner.

Stewart said they intended the study to be a test of their software, but they submitted their findings in February to the American Historical Association.

Oates complained to the Institutes' deputy inspector general and several congressman about the agency's support of research by scientists on a historian's writings.

Oates applauded the transfers of the two men. "They've gotten away with murder for a long time, and it just boggles my mind," Oates said.

Rejoice — hardcore's alive

Up and coming Quicksand expounds on their music

By ADAM GOULSTON
Collegian Staff

The soul of hardcore emanates through the pores of modern day alternative music. Few probably thought, as they relished the underground punk scene into the eighties (a scene which maintained its subterranean status), that bands like Agnostic Front and Minor Threat would be such a substantial influence on the bands that the next pack of rebellious youth would be listening to.

Countless bands today cannot and do not deny the influence that hardcore has had on them. Nirvana (and for that matter the whole grunge scene) would be non-existent without punk. Superchunk, whose elevated status stems from the fact that they are not a sellout and remain original, extract their sounds from the very roots of hardcore.

Among the special few bands who derive the brunt of their musical impact from hardcore while successfully updating it with a nineties polish and fuller sound is New York's Quicksand.

With the recent release of their first full-length album Slip, the foursome has developed a sound reminiscent of the last decade's hardcore but with a melody and precision of today.

I met lead singer/guitarist Walter Schreifels and bassist Sergio Vega at a recent industry schmooze in Boston. Later I would also meet guitarist Tom Capone. Quicksand could never develop a superstar mentality, they're just too human.

Adam Goulston: How long has the band been together?

Walter Schreifels and Sergio Vega: Three years.

AG: I asked because I was reading an ad in I think Nerve magazine which said you "survived the mid-eighties punk scene"

WS: Yeah, all those biography and promo things are kind of cheesy. It makes it sound like there was some big hardcore holocaust with people being killed and slaughtered.

AG: But you survived.

WS: We're from the heart. That's the scene we came out of. Some kid was like a metalhead and you wouldn't say he's a "metalhead survivor" you know?

AG: How did bands like Fugazi influence your sound?

WS: We kind of come from the same kind of place. When I was listening to hardcore I liked D.C. band like Minor Threat. I like Negative Approach. I like New York hardcore bands as well. I think Fugazi are kind of coming from that place. But I'm not interested in chasing Fugazi's tail or being influenced by them in that way. We don't want to be Robin, we want to be Batman.

AG: What do you think are the strongest influences on Slip?

WS: I think they're real eclectic influences. People say it sounds like Helmet or it sounds like Fugazi. We'll say, "that's not us or we want to do this this way." People want to interpret a new band in terms of what they already know. I'll hear a hip-hop song that's got a really cool drumbeat to it and think what if we put some heavy guitar over that and kind of in our way make it something different. It's totally eclectic. I'll be listening to some pop song or I'll be listening to some Slayer song and say like, "That's cool."

SV: Everyone in the band has their own influences and brings them in and we just kind of layer them on top of each other.

AG: How would you describe Slip to someone who's never heard it?

WS: I'd say it's definitely high energy. I think it's real emoted kind of music. It's not like "pop" songs. I'm screaming my head off through most of the record. I like to think that it's kind of cerebral.

AG: Like "Dine Alone," that's my favorite track on the album.

WS: Oh cool.

AG: Did something inspire that?

WS: My lyrics, it's like I'll often write part of a song one week and then come back like three weeks later and write something on the same subject. Often there's not one big general that I'm trying to get across like, "the message of this song is this." Although in "Dine Alone" there is a real feeling to that song. What inspired it is we needed the lyrics to a song that we had laid down and I was trying to write lyrics and sitting by myself in this restaurant. I'm like, "Okay, let me just think of something right here."

AG: And there you go.

WS: And there I went with it. It's not so much about eating by yourself as it is about feeling loneliness or alienation.

AG: I noticed on the lyric sheet, everything is in small letter and they're all just pieced out with no punctuation or anything. Is that representative of the style?

WS: I think to a degree yeah. When they were going about doing the lyric sheet, I started stressing; how am I gonna punctuate this? Am I gonna write it like prose? How am I gonna do this? The guy who was laying out the record came out with that and I was like you know, it's kind of hard to read.

AG: Do you ever have a problem maintaining this level of intensity and just want to do a nice power ballad or something, a slow song?

SV: Not yet. We've actually tried to do that, you know lighten ourselves a little. Because of the music that we liked at the time, it's just in our heart. You can't really escape what you are and who you are.

WS: I think the record is actually very much toned down from the sound that we initially came out with. First it was complete over the top. I would compare us to total metal bands or like Rage Against the Machine or something like that — like total high-powered hardcore. By the time we got around to recording the record, we were trying to get more mellow, trying to groove out. I still just don't think we can get away from the fact that we like powerful kinds of music.

SV: You just are what you are.

AG: Will you be out near UMass any time soon?

WS: We're in Boston in two weeks. We don't have any plans right now.

AG: Is there a favorite place you like to play?

WS: I like playing pretty much anywhere the kids are into it and even sometimes when the kids aren't into it it's fun too. We like playing near home too, because that's where we're most popular. The Northeast, like Boston, we like playing.

SV: That's a common sound in this area.

AG: Will hardcore ever die?

WS: Never. It'll never die. It will last forever.

SV: They're still trying to kill punk. It'll be a long time before they get hardcore.

WS: Til they get around to hardcore, forget it, we'll be old men.

Diner has taste to entice senses

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

Simply Delicious, the "diner of the 21st century," is the perfect rest stop from the orbiting traffic on route 9 in Hadley. Its clean, bright atmosphere provided a refuge from yesterday's gray rain.

The diner's huge windows, which comprise half of the wall space, bring back memories of the observation deck on the Starship Enterprise.

Colorful, vibrant drawings of the diner's specials are the artistic creation of the third shift cook Dann Merritt. These pictures line the top of the other half of the walls.

Restaurant Review

Incredible special deals include two hot dogs and a 16 ounce Coke for $3 and a bowl of Stick in the Mud Fries (gravy and mozzarella over crinkle cut fries) for $1.75. Students get a 15% discount (but make sure you remember to point it out to your server when you get the bill!) Coffee is only 50 cents which is a huge plus for a diner open 24 hours.

I began my meal with a delicous Super Float, root beer with three scoops of vanilla ice cream. Served in a transparent plastic beer mug with a handle, this beverage screamed DINER.

As I sucked up the ice cream through the straw (until my face turned blue), I took in my surroundings. The juke box plays everything from classic rock to top 40 hits. Candy machines and a palm reading machine stand as sentries by the front door.

The owner Bill Zagorski and his son Dave work side by side at the long red counter which runs down the middle of the diner. This father and son duo look startlingly similar and work well together. Dave takes the orders and Bill works his way through the days' managerial concerns.

Simply Delicious began as a hot dog cart in Easthampton. It then moved to Northampton, where Zagorski hired a young woman just to entice the traffic to stop. Zagorski told the Hampshire Gazette that this halter top clad woman was the "attractor."

Now, Simply Delicious is located between the Hampshire and Mountain Farm Malls, next to the Automatic Teller Machine.

You may need to run over to the ATM, when you hear the dessert menu, which has daily specials also. Simply Delicious offers apple pie and cheese cake every day. The apple pie's heavy cinnamon flavor mixes smoothly with the french vanilla ice cream that runs down over its sides in sticky, tasty pools.

Simply Delicious is definately worth the stop for a lightning quick, economical meal that is simply out of this world.

Playboy special pictures women, college hot-spots

By KAREN KOVATCH
Generation X-Press

(GXP) Ask most men on the nation's college campuses what April brings, and they probably won't say rain showers or May flowers. They're more likely to tell you it marks the release of Playboy magazine's college women issue.

Each year, Playboy photographers hop across country visiting various colleges and universities in search of women to be included in biannual theme issues published in October and April.

Beginning in October, photographers launched a month-long search at 10 universities in nine states to find 24 women for the "Student Body" issue, which hit the stands March 16.

This year, photography crews combed the campuses of Central Michigan, the University of Vermont, Ball State University in Indiana, the University of Georgia, Southern Illinois University, California State University at Chico, the University of Texas at Austin, San Diego State University, the University of Colorado and Arizona State University.

"We wanted a nice cross-section of girls, and we thought we'd have them with these schools," says Playboy publicist Karen Ring. Despite protests from various campus groups, Ring says between 200 and 300 women came out to be photographed at each location. "If we get a town where there are a lot of protests, we get a better turnout, so we don't mind it at all."

Moore agrees. "Every time (we visit a campus to photograph girls) we have that problem (with protests), and it's such a big problem it swells the pool of women that show up."

Moore says prior to arriving at a campus, Playboy typically places an ad in the student newspaper listing the address and the phone number of the hotel suite near campus in which auditions will be held. "As soon as that ad hits the stand, that's when the protests get organized."

Interested women can call to set up a photo shoot in which they pose nude or semi-nude for polaroids. Women must provide two forms of identification prior to being photographed, one which must verify they are a student at the university. They are also asked to furnish information about themselves, such as their majors.

Though photographers spend approximately three to four hours with each woman in these initial sessions, Moore says they are simply designed "to get an idea of how people respond to the camera."

Photographers review all of the polaroids before narrowing the field and making their final selections. Moore says contrary to popular myth, photographers don't usually look for professional model-types or glamour goddesses when selecting finalists, but women who represent the image of the "girl next door."

"There's nothing more like the girl next door than a college undergraduate," he says. "A college undergraduate woman is a woman you can respect — it's a woman you can meet."

The magazine gives readers a chance to meet this year's college models. They include University of Colorado senior Judy Hernandez who tells the magazine that she "loves spending time with (her) husband" and San Diego State University sophomore Sherry Norton who says that "to be in Playboy is just a dream."

Ring says that when considering finalist, photographers look for women who are not only attractive and well-proportioned, but interesting to us," she says. But there's more to the college women issues than pictures. After the pictorial is complete, Moore faces the task of producing stories to run with it. "It's usually an essay discussing the state of whatever conference we happen to be covering at the time," he says.

In this year's issue, the magazine highlights "campus beats" that include the best professors (among them Fanny Howe, whose poetry class at the University of California at San Diego features works by rappers Queen Latifah and Arrested Development); the best radio stations, the most notorious make-out spots (at Central Michigan it's in the satellite dishes by the football field); and oddest campus parties among other things.

The college women issues have been well-received by readers each year since Playboy began doing them in 1977. Moore believes this is due to the memories college women can spark among men of all ages. "They recall happy times in many of our readers' lives."

Ring says as a result of this, Playboy will continue with its college women issues protests or not. "The readers love it. That's why we'll keep doing it."

Salamanders hitting the road

By TRUDY TYNAN
Associated Press

Bestirred by warm rains and guarded by soggy humans, scores of spotted salamanders wasted no time this spring heading into custom designed tunnels that lead them under a road to their breeding pools.

"They waited so long and the conditions were so perfect that they all ran through," Tom Tyning, a naturalist with the Massachusetts Audubon Society, said Monday. "It was the best year in the past 20."

In cooler springs, the salamanders have slowly eased into the 19 inch high passageways. They needed encouragement by volunteers lighting the ends of the tunnels with shielded flashlights.

The annual emergence of the navy blue amphibians with yellow polka dots has become a rite of spring in this college town, which installed the tunnels topped with grates six years ago.

The salamanders, which are six to eight inches long, winter in burrows on a hillside.

About 150 salamanders traipsed down the wooded hill in a drenching rain Saturday, while about that many humans kept count and watched for traffic.

For 15 years before the town built the tunnels, residents gathered to stop traffic on Henry Street while the salamanders crossed.

"A lot of people slept through Easter dinner," Tyning said. He said it was so exciting he stayed out until 3 a.m.

"With all the great snow and rain we've had, all the wetlands are at their peak this spring," he said. "It's the perfect time to figure out where not to build buildings or parking lots."

Many species of amphibians, including the spotted salamander that can live for up to 20 years, need at least periodic wet years to ensure their survival, Tyning said. Too often, he said the snow fed pools in which they breed dry up before their young can hatch and grow to the point where they can live on land.

as: Do I feel comfortable here?, What is the lighting like? and What changes would make me feel safer?

"It is my belief that women do not have access to safe public facilities," Guberman said. "And women have to spend an enormous amount of energy protecting themselves."

Since 1989, the process of auditing has worked and made progress towards changing the desing of over 64 Metro stations in Canada, Guberman said.

Information was also distributed at the lecture through a video which focused on Queens University, located in Kingston Canada.

The video showed students auditing buildings on their campus, and women speaking out about their concerns.

"I refuse to hold office hours after 5 p.m., due to a fear of having a male student argue with me about changing a grade," a female professor at Queens said on the video. "I only feel safe standing my ground when I know there are other people around."

Making the environment safer for women will make it safer for everyone, including the elderly, gays and lesbians, and the disabled, Guberman said after the video.

An informal question and answer period followed the lecture, and many of the people who attended expressed concern for the issue, and asked Guberman for advice on how to start a program similar to METRAC here at UMass.

Masterson hopes for more 'wild' roles

LOS ANGELES (AP) — It's not that Mary Stuart Masterson is tired of playing sensitive, troubled young women. But the star of "Fried Green Tomatoes" and "Benny and Joon" would like something with more of a kick.

"When do I get to have fun in a movie?" the 26-year-old asked. "I'd like to very much play a flamboyant, out-there wild-and-crazy character.

"I'd love it. It's a side of me that no one gets to see except my poor friends."

Still, she's not complaining about her current role as Joon, a young woman emotionally traumatized by the death of her parents. She falls for Benny, an equally dysfunctional outsider played by Johnny Depp.

The bittersweet romantic comedy was challenging because much of the humor came from the characters' pain, Masterson said in Saturday's Daily News of Los Angeles.

"So when you act it, you act the reality of it, not the joke, not the punch lines," she said.

Masterson played the rebellious Idgie in last year's hit "Fried Green Tomatoes."

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): An out of town business matter requires special attention. Be willing to travel to handle the situation personally. The afternoon favors negotiations.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Sink yourself into your work today; steady effort will spawn a big success. If domestic affairs are touchy tonight, subordinate your ego to mate's needs. Try our new recipes on the family.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): A real powerhouse of a day for brainstorming. You and your associates cook up a plan that will whet the public's appetite. A business triumph or exciting romantic interlude brings delight.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): What you learn about love today will open your eyes. A timely trip could have a big payoff. You see the beauty of a long-range plan. Implement it as quickly as possible.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): You and a close friend consider joining forces in a creative venture. Any partnerships formed at this time should turn out quite well. Put everything in writing to avoid future misunderstandings.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Consult an expert if stumped by a personal or professional problem. Sales merchandise must be examined with special care. Overseas contacts offer profitable ideas. Romance turns serious.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Be good natured. What appears to be a failure is nothing more than a temporary delay. When you smile, everyone around you gets a lift.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A change in personnel may lead to old methods being discarded. Stick to a strict schedule to accomplish more. Higher-ups may be evaluating your job performance. Do not underestimate your value.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): A plan may be altered or temporarily delayed. Those close to you express contrary views. Getting advice from a professional will be worth the cost. Avoid rocking the boat in romance tonight.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): A joint bank account could cause a disagreement now. Be cautious; avoid making ra[illegible]sions. Evening hours favors cre[illegible]sult at home. Discuss family [illegible] privately with your mate.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): When you reach out to others, they respond in kind. Your can do attitude wins new attention for your creative efforts.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Your self discipline and attention to detail will produce great results today. A friend has news you will like. Your charm and warmth attract a new admirer. Heed your intuition in romance.

Want to help us serve 1,000,000 meals to the hungry?

Sign here.

A new CD. An LSAT prep course. A pair of running shoes.

It makes no difference what you buy. Because as a Student Cardmember, each time you charge a purchase with the American Express Card from March 15 to April 30, 1993, you help pay for one meal for someone who's hungry.

The more purchases you make, no matter how big or small, the more meals you help provide. It's that simple.

Our goal? To help buy 1,000,000 meals* for America's hungry men, women and children.

To make it work, we've brought together a powerful team — you, our Student Cardmembers, and Share Our Strength. SOS is a nationwide non-profit organization fighting to end hunger. And they're doing it in some very resourceful ways.

For example, most restaurants have extra food at the end of the night, but they don't always know what to do with it. SOS does. They see to it that the food is delivered to those who need it. In fact, they've mobilized more than 5,000 restaurants to join the fight against hunger, here in the U.S. and around the world.

Now every time you use the Card to buy anything at all, you're helping provide a meal for the hungry.

So next time you reach in your wallet to pay for a purchase, put it on the American Express Card. And help make a difference to someone who's hungry.

If you're not currently a Cardmember, but would like to apply, please call us at 1-800-365-AMEX.

Barkley spells superstar for the Phoenix Suns: MVP

"It is so choice, If you have the means, I highly suggest you pick one up."

No, this is not Ferris Bueller's Day Off, it is another edition of Notes from the Hardwood. The theme today is high profile players, and the most valuable player in the NBA this season is Charles Barkley.

NOTES FROM THE HARDWOOD by Art Stapleton

The Suns had "Thunder" Dan Majerle. Kevin Johnson. Tom Chambers. Cedric Ceballos. These guys are profile players (well, at least Majerle and KJ are). But Phoenix lacked something.

Something like Lord Charles.

In the world of sports merchandise, for a team to hit it big with the youth of today, it must have cool colors or an awesome logo.

But the biggest way to become a huge seller is by getting a prime time player, like Jordan, Barkley or Karl Malone. The Suns not only have talent now but a following to boot. Only time will tell until they win a ring that Salem Screen can put on a T-shirt for the public to buy at twenty bucks a pop.

Playoffs mean the X-Man is back.

Last season, Xavier McDaniel finally reached his expectations for the New York Knicks in the seven-game war with Chicago. X truly is a star when the playoff curtain drops. On Sunday, McDaniel tried to single-handedly lead his team over his former mates.

Despite scoring 24 points and snagging nine boards, the X-Man was still on the losing end in the C's fifth loss in a row. However, in three weeks that famed light goes on, and McDaniel will once again be ready to shine.

Dumars, Isiah make Pistons playoff contenders.

Two years ago, there would be no argument that the best backcourt in the NBA was in Detroit. However, the Motown Maulers have seen Chuck Daly retire, Dennis Rodman flirt with the wild side, and Bill Laimbeer just do what he always did: nothing.

But one thing that stayed consistent for Detroit was the tandem of Joe Dumars and Isiah Thomas. Recently, these two have been on a mission night in and night out leading the Pistons on their ascension from the ashes in the East.

Maybe Dumars is the second-best two guard in the NBA. Maybe Isiah does have a few highlights left on the reel. Either way, you are forgetting that if Michael Jordan matches up against the Pistons, it is bye-bye Bad Boys.

Did you see that?

- Doc Rivers hit the floor playing that aggressive Knickerbocker brand of basketball and lost two teeth in the process. How many teeth would he lose in a brawl?
- How many games the New Jersey Nets have to lose in order to make the lottery and have a shot at "Penny" Hardaway?
- "Coors" Cutter Garcia and his strip Cutter's World on the comics page.

quarter, LoPresti was saving everything."

Attackman Wes Depp was also impressive for UMass as he compiled two goals, including one to tie the game at 12 late in the fourth quarter, and teammate Bill Edell had a goal and two assists. For Yale, the big guns did not disappoint, as junior Simon Duxbury led the way with two goals and two assists followed by sophomore Rocky Mould, who also had a pair of dingers.

Despite outshooting the Bulldogs in the first half (40-29 game), the Gorillas still trailed 5-4 at the half. In the third quarter, Yale scored three unanswered goals before UMass scored again, and then ran off four straight to up their lead to 12-5.

Lax note: The Gorillas jumped five spaces in the USILA division 1 poll to 10th, one behind Duke, who they beat last Sunday.

WRams are currently undefeated in the A-10, sporting a 2-0 record. Rhode Island heads into the contest having lost their last two games while the Minutewomen aren't much hotter, losing three of their last four.

A Minutewomen sweep of the Lady WRams would put UMass back on the winning track and vault them past URI and into first place in the A-10 standings.

Track season has begun

By MATT VAUTOUR
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's track team opened their 1993 season against the University of Rhode Island and Amherst College on Saturday. Although URI was victorious, the Minutemen were very impressive in their first outing.

Saturday's contest went down to the wire, with the final score being Rhode Island 89, UMass 82. Amherst managed only 13. Both UMass and URI carried eight of the sixteen events. The lead changed hands several times before URI came away with the victory.

"I expected a close meet. Around the ten point area," said coach Ken O'Brien. "It was a little closer than I expected."

Balance was a key to how well UMass did, as all of the event groups were represented in the scoring.

UMass was led by Paul Doyle, who earned thirty points himself, placing first in the 120 and 400 meter hurdles, and the pole vault. Bob Dalton, (discus) Joe Kourafas (long jump), Tom Galligani (triple jump), Bouillard (5000 meters) and Jim Avery (800 meters) were also winners for UMass.

"The biggest surprise was Bob Dalton winning the discus," O'Brien said.

Freshman Marc LeFebvre continued his impressive rookie season, placing second in shot put and third in discus. Jumper Chris DiMatio also placed in two events with a third in the long jump, and a second in the triple jump.

Despite the forecast of rain, the weather conditions did not prove to be a problem.

"They were not difficult conditions," O'Brien said. "It bothered the vaulters the most."

Tomorrow afternoon at 3 p.m., the Minutemen will try to continue their success when the University of Vermont visits to make up the meet that was postponed last Saturday. Due to the postponement, the University of Maine, which was originally scheduled, will not be competing. UMass edged UVM in a close meet during the indoor season, which will leave Vermont thirsty for revenge. The Minutemen have become stronger for the outdoor campaign and are optimistic about Wednesday's competition.

Vermont has some very talented individual performers, but O'Brien predicted a victory. He said he feels UMass' depth UMass should counterbalance Vermont's strength.

UMass softball splits twinbill with Rutgers

By SEAN P. HAYDEN
Collegian Staff

Fresh off a weekend split with Atlantic 10 foe Rutgers, the University of Massachusetts softball team heads south today to do battle with the University of Rhode Island in a match-up of the top two teams in the A-10 standings.

In the Rutgers doubleheader, the Minutewomen dropped the first contest 6-5, but came back strong in the nightcap, posting an 8-4 victory.

Rutgers scored often and early in the first game in posting their six run total in the first two innings. UMass got back into the game thanks to a third-inning two-run home run from senior catcher Sherri Kuchinskas and a fourth-inning sacrifice fly from senior leftfielder Stacey Nichols.

Sophomore Kelly Daut suffered her seventh loss against three victories, pitching six innings and allowing eight hits.

Nichols started things off with a bang in the second game by belting her second home run of the year, but the majority of the Minutewomen offense was provided by junior second baseman Tracey DuEst.

DuEst had a run-scoring single in the first, a run-scoring double in the third, and a two-run single in the fourth when the Minutewomen took the lead for good.

DuEst's punch at the plate helped senior rigthhander Darlene Claffey up her season record to 4-4. Claffey went the distance and allowed nine hits.

Against URI, UMass will be led by Kuchinskas, who just picked up the A-10 Player of the Week honors for the week of April 11th.

Kuchinskas batted .522 (12-for-23), with eight runs batted in, one home run, and seven runs scored. Kuchinskas is currently third in the A-10 in batting, hitting at a .396 clip.

Millon scores game-winner for Gorillas

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team proved to the college lacrosse world Saturday that they are a team to be reckoned with by defeating No. 16 Yale in New Haven Conn, 14-13, thanks to two unassisted goals in the final seconds by Mark Millon.

With 26 seconds left, Sam Joseph won the faceoff and dished to a streaking Greg Kline (two assists) who bolted to the net and fired a hard shot off the slick turf. Yale goalie Rich Kessler made the initial save but the rebound bounced right into the stick of Millon, who fired it home to knot the score at 13.

On Yale's ensuing possession, UMass knocked the ball out of bounds to regain possession and then inbounded to Millon. As the clock ticked down, he took the ball at midfield, stepped left and spun around his defender - with four seconds left, the 1992 first team All-America then fired a shot from 15 yards out past Kessler for the win. The Gorilla bench erupted.

"On the first goal he said it (the ball) looked like a beach ball because it popped right into his stick," said assistant coach Greg Cannella. "With the second goal, Mark showed why he's one of the best players in the country."

With 4:16 remaining in the third quarter, UMass trailed 12-5 and things looked bleak. But whatever Coach Ted Garber said to them must have worked because seven unanswered goals were scored from that point (five by Millon) to tie the game at 12 with 3:33 left in the game. The Bulldogs Chris Disimile scored with just 37 seconds left to give Yale a one point lead but then Millon pulled his heroics.

"I just told them that they didn't have to get it all back in one play," said coach Ted Garber. "They showed a lot of patience and poise out there and had a lot of good reads on the defense so a lot of scoring opportunities were created."

The defense, led by the tag-team goalie duo of Tom LoPresti (six saves) and Rip Correnti (five saves), should also be commended for holding the Bulldogs to one goal in the last quarter.

"The two of them played an absolutely great game," said Garber. "But in that last

Minutemen host Vermont in doubleheader today

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN

The University of Massachusetts baseball team (7-11) has a big week ahead at home as they host Vermont today and Maine on Thursday.

When it rains it pours, and neither the weather nor the schedule of the University of Massachusetts baseball team appears to be letting up.

The Minutemen (7-11) will take on the University of Vermont today at 1 p.m. in a doubleheader, weather permitting. The Catamounts are coming into the contest with a 12-7 record and are 8-4 in the North Atlantic Conference. UMass head coach Mike Stone, who is in his sixth year here, coached two years at Vermont.

Stone has enough to worry about with his current squad, without worrying about a team he used to coach. The Minutemen are reeling, having lost six of their last seven. In that span, they have given up 62 runs and have committed 16 errors.

The team is outhitting its opponents (.296 to .291), but has had trouble getting base hits in the clutch. Junior left fielder Justin Howard leads everyday players with a .452 batting average. Howard also has three home runs, 17 runs batted in, and five stolen bases.

Freshman second baseman Mark Pileski is also tearing the cover off the ball with a .391 average and 15 RBI. Pileski leads the team with eight doubles and has provided steady defense in replacing John Carelli at second base.

First baseman Bill Knight and catcher Jeff January have provided the power for the Minutemen, as they lead the team with four homers each. January has knocked in 17 runs, to lead the team, while Knight has 12 RBI.

Senior right fielder Steve Corradi and sophomore shortstop Greg LaRocca have joined the offensive mix by scoring 15 and 13 runs, respectively. Corradi leads UMass with six steals.

The pitching is the problem for this squad, as only Greg Dowd (2.57 earned run average) has an ERA under 3.00. Number one starter Jeff Toothaker has a 4.78 ERA. Number two starter Jim Telgheder has a 4.73 ERA. Stone has said he has little pitching after these two. He's right.

A staff lined with freshman (John Alves, Rich Johnson, Peter Lucido and Jay Murphy) has for the most part failed to produce. Left-hander Scott Meaney is on the shelf with back problems, and no one has stepped up.

It does not get any easier for the Minutemen after Vermont. On Thursday, the University of Maine comes into town for a 3 p.m. contest. The Black Bears have been the largest New England baseball powerhouse, sending players like Mike Bordick and Bill Swift to the major leagues. This weekend, UMass heads to West Virginia for a three-game set at a crucial point in the A-10 schedule.

Minutewomen beat Hartford, improve to 2-1

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

Heading into last Thursday's match against the University of Hartford, University of Massachusetts captain Pam Levine said she knew UMass' struggling doubles teams were more than capable of winning.

Levine told the truth.

UMass' three doubles teams swept Hartford's three tandems, paving the way for the Minutewomen's 7-2 victory. All three of the UMass (2-1) doubles squads needed just two sets to polish off their Hartford (0-1) foes.

At first doubles, UMass' Liesl Sitton and Lesley Watts fought past Hartford's Jessica Sklar and Sarah McShane 6-4, 6-4. In a close match at second doubles, Minutewomen Levine and Stacey Scheckner squeaked past Amy Saviano and Lori Fisher 6-4, 7-6.

In the last doubles encounter, Alissa Cohen and Kelly Grim of UMass demolished Hartford's Julie Merrill and Hilary Linder 6-1, 6-1.

The singles department for UMass held their own as well. The Minutewomen posted a 4-2 mark in singles competition.

Liesl Sitton continued her torrid play at the No. 1 singles spot as Sitton wiped out Jessica Sklar 6-1, 6-2. UMass coach Judy Dixon shook things up in the middle singles spots as she moved Pam Levine up to No. 2 from No. 4. Levine almost made that move look masterful as she fell in a long three setter to Amy Saviano, 6-4, 2-6, 6-0.

At No. 3 singles, Hartford's Sarah McShane slid past UMass' Lesley Watts 6-2, 6-2. Stacey Scheckner, playing in her new role at No. 4 singles, beat Lori Fisher 6-2, 6-1.

UMass' No. 5 and No. 6 singles players, Alissa Cohen and Kelly Grim respectively, showed that they are big part of the Minutewomen's success as they swept their Hartford foes. Both Cohen and Grim are undefeated in singles play (3-0) on the year.

Dixon said that she was more than happy with the way her team played.

"I am very pleased with the victory," Dixon said. "I really didn't know what to expect from Hartford, but I thought they would be tough.

"Our doubles teams really played well to get the sweep," Dixon said. "It showed that it really helps when you have extra time on the court together (the doubles teams)."

Court notes: Yesterday's match at the University of Connecticut was postponed due to the poor weather conditions. The new date for that match at UConn is April 21. Up next for the Minutewomen is a battle with Springfield College on the UMass home courts at Mt. Holyoke College. Dixon said she thinks her squad will be ready for Springfield.

"We should do well, if we play the way we've been playing," Dixon said. "The Springfield coach called and said that they are a very young team.

"We are a team right now that has good depth." Dixon said. "Our No. 5 and No. 6 singles players are undefeated so far."

Prison siege into 3rd day; tear gas used

By SONIA BARISIC
Associated Press

LUCASVILLE, Ohio — The inmate death toll rose to seven Tuesday at a maximum-security prison where eight guards were held hostage, and rebellious convicts yelled to other prisoners to join them in the siege. Guards fired tear gas to restore order.

The prisoners barricaded inside the Southern Ohio Correctional Facility also rigged a loudspeaker to complain about negotiations. Negotiators said they too were not encouraged by the progress of the talks.

The prisoners have been denied food, heat, electricity and water since the riot Sunday.

A guard on patrol at the prison found the seventh body in a cell of the K cellblock. The unit is linked by a corridor to the cellblock, where 450 prisoners have been barricaded, since a scuffle among a few prisoners escalated into a riot.

Investigators didn't know if the inmate, Dennis Weaver, 43, was killed or committed suicide, said Tessa Unwin, a spokeswoman for the Ohio Department of Rehabilitation and Correction. She said he was not alone in the cell, but would not say how many other prisoners were inside at the time.

She wouldn't say what caused Weaver's death, but said "it wasn't a natural death," and he hadn't been dead long.

Advertising manipulates women, says lecturer

By DARIENNE HOSLEY
Collegian Staff

Addictions are a profitable business, and the $130 billion a year advertising industry is targeting women with powerful — and dangerous — images, said Jean Kilbourne last night at Amherst College.

"Advertising shames women and sets us up for addiction," she said.

Over 200 people filled the auditorium for Kilbourne's slide presentation and lecture, titled "Marketing Misery: Selling Addictions to Women."

Kilbourne, who holds a doctoral degree in education, is a frequent speaker on alcohol and cigarette advertising and images of women in marketing. She has filmed three of her lectures, "Killing Us Softly," "Calling the Shots" and "Pack of Lies," and twice received the Lecturer of the Year award by the National Association for Campus Activities.

The lecture was part of WomenSpeak 1993, a month-long series of events focusing on pursuits and issues concerning women and was cosponsored by the Amherst College Drug and Alcohol Program and the Five College Alcohol Commission.

Advertisers promote and use women's feelings of inadequacy to pitch their product as the solution to their problems, Kilbourne said, when the product itself is often the problem.

"At the core of every addiction is isolation, loneliness," she said. "The cigarette smoker feels the cigarette is her best friend when, in reality, the cigarette is the assassin."

By using computer-enhanced images of thin, attractive women, Kilbourne said advertisers create an ideal image of beauty women cannot achieve and then offer a product that supposedly will make up for this shortcoming. "The ideal is based on absolute flawlessness. She [the model] never has any scars or blemishes; indeed she has no pores," Kilbourne said.

Since the female figure advertisers prefer — tall, thin, narrow-hipped and approximately 23 pounds lighter than the average female — is nearly impossible to find, she said, most advertisements show "dismembered" parts of many different women.

This objectification, Kilbourne said, does not directly cause acts of violence against women, but creates the climate for them by dehumanizing women. "It's very easy to abuse a thing," she said.

Kilbourne stressed sharing resources and working to end manipulative advertising by writing to media outlets and advertisers, running counter-ad programs that ridicule major ad campaigns and supporting national organizations that challenge major advertisers.

Barriers block court entrance as L.A. waits

By LINDA DEUTSCH
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Barricades went up around the courthouse and Marines practiced storming a town Tuesday, the fourth day of jury deliberations in the Rodney King beating case.

Sketch artists were admonished by the U.S. District Judge John Davies, who said they were "too accurate for comfort" in their portrayals of the anonymous jury deciding the fate of four police officers accused of violating King's civil rights.

"Any drawings of jurors or alternates must contain minimal detail and must not render them recognizable," the judge wrote in a court order posted in the courthouse press room.

A crane lowered 3-foot-high concrete barriers into place outside the federal building, blocking the entrance to crowds and vehicles, and a chainlink fence went up around a parking lot across the street. Police said it would be used as a staging area.

"This is part of our preparedness program," said Lt. John Dunkin.

Three held in school stabbing

By JOSE MARTINEZ
Associated Press

DARTMOUTH — Three teenagers were ordered Tuesday to undergo psychiatric evaluation after being charged with fatally stabbing a high school classmate and then laughing about it.

Prosecutors said the alleged killers were looking to settle a score with a friend of the victim after an earlier fight.

Jason Robinson, 16, a Dartmouth High School freshman, was attacked with a baseball bat, then stabbed to death in a social studies class on Monday.

"What are these kids, sick?" Gov. William Weld said Tuesday. "They came in armed with baseball bats and knives — it's mind boggling."

Karter Reed and Gator Collet, both 16, and 15-year-old Nigel Thomas were arraigned Tuesday in juvenile deliquescing by reason of murder, carrying a dangerous weapon, assault and battery with a dangerous weapon and disturbing the peace. Reed, a student at New Bedford Vocational High School, was also charged with trespassing.

Judge Ronald Harper ordered they be held without bail by the state Department of Youth Services and undergo psychiatric evaluations. A hearing is scheduled for May 11.

A bail hearing was scheduled for Thomas on April 20 because of questions about his legal guardianship.

"It is our contention that all three were involved in the assault," said Gilbert Nadeau, assistant district attorney.

Prosecutors said they would seek to have the youths tried as adults.

Assistant District Attorney Thomas Quinn said the three allegedly burst into the classroom, demanding to know the whereabouts of one of Robinson's friends.

Because their alleged intended target wasn't there, Quinn said, one of the youths charged Robinson and hit him with a baseball bat. Reed allegedly stabbed him in the stomach, and Robinson stumbled to the hallway and collapsed. He was pronounced dead form a single stab wound at St. Luke's Hospital in New Bedford.

Outside the school, the flag flew at half mast Tuesday while a staff of 25 counselors met inside with students in groups and individually.

The mood was somber, Principal Donald King said.

"The students are filled with grief and anger," he said. "Most of the anger being expressed now by the student body is that they want the press out of here."

Students gave the principal a letter signed by many of their peers asking that he bar reporters form the school beginning Wednesday. Some hollered at television crews as they left the building.

"Don't you people have feelings?" yelled one girl. Another cried, "It's pretty obvious how we feel."

But Aaron Cormier, one of Robinson's best friends, said he wanted to set the record straight.

Cormier, 15, sat in front of Robinson in their first-period social studies class and witnessed his friend's death.

"It's crazy," he said. "I didn't realize he had a knife. It must have been in his sleeve. I thought he was just punching Jason. I didn't realize it was a knife until it was in Jason."

Cormier said the attack was one of several fights that had erupted in the last week since a keg party turned into a rumble fight last week in Dartmouth.

He said another teenager, Sean Pina, may have punched a friend of one of the three defendants.

"Nigel Thomas told Pina he wanted to fight one-on-one," Cormier said.

The two apparently squared off on the third floor of the high school at about 7:30 a.m. the day of the killing, prosecutors said. Reed, Thomas and Collet fled the school, while Pina and another youth, Wayne Silva, were hauled to the principal's office and suspended for fighting.

Meanwhile, the three other youths charged Tuesday reentered the school, apparently looking for Pina. Moments later, Robinson was stabbed.

"When they stabbed that kid, they were looking for me," said Pina. "I couldn't understand why they went after him. He had nothing to do with it."

Cormier said Reed and Collet "high-fived" and laughed, then turned and challenged the two dozen students in the classroom: "Tell all his boys, you're all dead," they said, according to Cormier.

Shy poets seek refuge in anonymous program

By TROY L. MERRICK
Collegian Staff

The Poet's Anonymous Program, started last December at the University of Massachusetts, will help individuals utilize their creativity in poetry writings and ease the anxiety felt by some aspiring poets when making their work public, said program organizers.

"We started the program to encourage writers to do something with their poetry," said the program's founder, Dianne Bilyak said.

"We want them to share it rather than get a creative urge, put their expression and ideas on paper, and put it in a folder never to be seen again."

The group was started through the Residential Arts Galleries Outreach Program, and Bilyak, who has a master's degree in creativity from the University of Massachusetts School of Education. Bilyak now heads the program.

She has been hard at work promoting the writers program since the end of last semester.

"The group is essentially for those who are afraid to call themselves poets, although they've written poetic work," Bilyak said.

"It's also an alternative to writing classes, of which there aren't many here with which to use this type of script."

The group has approximately 20 members, and many say they enjoy the group for what it offers in terms of enhancing their artistic abilities.

"These things are great. They're laid back, relaxing and invaluable sources of inspiration," said Katherine Karcz, a sophomore double major in art and psychology.

"It doesn't matter what people say about reclusive writers. You need exposure and criticism to progress."

"I want to show the Valley that UMass is more than just basketball and multicultural whining," said Dan Shea, a junior English major.

"It's about poetry and the new young poets who are leading the way."

PoAnon, as Bilyak calls the group for short, conducts meetings where members congregate to share ideas, do creative spur-of-the-moment writing, and read some of their verse aloud.

This gives a sense of the ideas the other poets have in mind and feel for ways to better their own work.

Most of the meetings are held in the Hampden Gallery in Southwest and on the eighth floor of the Campus Center on Mondays and Thursdays.

The group plans to compile a book of the members' work sometime in May.

"I hope to get a lot done with the group this semester and possibly get more people to come out for it next year as well," Bilyak said.

"I know that many people of all interests have or do write peotry, and I'd like them to share it."

Bilyak asks that anyone interested in the program call her at 545-2804 or contact her through Residential Arts, located on the fifth floor of John Quincy Adams Residence Hall.

Film, profs depict Malcolm X

Organizers cite importance of Black nationalist

By MARTIN JONES
Collegian Staff

Tonight is the final campus showing of the film Malcolm X, based on the life of the slain Black nationalist. The film, running three and a half hours, has been aired once each night since Monday in a series sponsored by the Panhellenic Council, the UMass Pan-Hellenic council and the Black Student Union.

Monique Nash, president of the Panhellenic Council governing board of the campus sororities said that her group, along with the UMass Pan-Hellenic Council and the Black Student Union were asked by the Student Activities Office to sponsor the film after it became available for campus release. According to Nash, the three groups were seen as the best sponsors of the film and intended for the showing to help educate the campus on racial issues.

Three faculty members were invited to speak each night prior to the film. On Monday, professor John Bracey of the Afro-American studies department gave a brief lecture regarding the quality of the film and the significance of Malcolm's life. Bracey called the film "an amazing piece of work," and cited Malcolm X's rise from "the bottom of society to end up having a tremendous impact on the world."

Professor David G. DuBois of the journalism department, who worked with Spike Lee on the film, told about his role as a historical consultant on the depiction of Malcolm X's 1964 trip to Egypt. DuBois had interviewed Malcolm X that year when he attended the Organization of African Unity's annual conference in Cairo.

Douglas Greer, president of the UMass Pan-Hellenic Council, a body that represents the Black fraternities and sororities, called Malcolm X "the last great leader who wasn't afraid to speak out on behalf of Black people."

"Today's Black leaders are more interested in their political careers," Greer said. "That's the biggest difference between him and the leaders of today."

Fabiola Narcisse, president of the Black Student Union, said she hopes the film will raise awareness over the racial issues surrounding the federal trial of the four Los Angeles police officers charged with violating Black motorist Rodney King's civil rights. Footage of the videotaped beating of King by the L.A. police is featured in the opening credits of the film.

"The footage shown within the film shows that a lot of the violence from back then remains to this day," Narcisse said. "Violence against Black people is a continuing problem."

Early in the film, the lynching of Malcolm's father by the Ku Klux Klan sets the stage for the Black leader's fiery rhetoric which called for Blacks to defend themselves "by any means necessary." The movie ends with Malcolm's own assassination as he speaks at a rally for his newly formed Black nationalist group, the Organization of Afro-American Unity.

Also featured at the end of the film is the South African leader of the Afrikan National Congress, Nelson Mandela, who compares the struggle led by Malcolm X in the '60s to present-day problems in South Africa.

Tonight's film will begin at 7 p.m. and tickets are $3. The faculty speaker will be Helan Page of the anthropology department.

Math skills add up to big bucks

Competition winners to take home large cash prizes

By FRANCIS ZERA
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts department of mathematics and statistics recently announced the winners of its eighth annual math competition.

The competition, supported by United Technologies and held March 30, was open to University freshman and sophomores.

The competition consisted of a 10-question, two-hour exam. Fifty-one students took the exam, which tested their knowledge of mathematics from pre-calculus through second-semester level calculus.

Matthew Tagliani, a freshman mathematics major, took first place, along with $1,600 from the University. Michael Ebert, a freshman engineering major, placed second and will receive $1,000 from United Technologies.

The third place winner, sophomore computer science major Kwan Liu, will be awarded $400 from the department of mathematics and statistics.

There were two honorable mentions, freshman math major Pavel Groisman and freshman electrical engineering major Esther Wung. Groisman and Wung will receive $50 each for their efforts.

The awards ceremony is scheduled for April 28 at 7:30 p.m., in the physics lounge, which is located in 1033 Graduate Research Center.

Dean Frederick Byron of the College of Math and Natural Sciences will officiate and present Tagliani with the first place award.

A representative from United Technologies will present second prize, and David Hayes, head of the department of mathematics and statistics, will present the third place award as well as the honorable mentions.

Student gov't finishes count of March vote

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

After originally deciding not to count absentee ballots, the student government tallied up the 607 votes cast by voters not in their precincts, said student government officials.

Election officials said there were not enough absentee ballots to warrant counting them.

Jon Aronson, the former chair of governmental affairs, said even if one person received all the votes, nothing would have changed.

"Nothing could be affected — that's why it took so long to count them," Aronson said.

The UMass Cannabis Reform Coalition was especially insistent on getting the votes counted. Aaron Wilson, the vice-president of the coalition, said he felt the 607 votes should not go uncounted.

"More importantly, it's the principle. You don't throw people's votes away — it sets a dangerous precedent," Wilson said. "It's really good that the student government is willing to make the effort."

The coalition was also disappointed that the hemp initiative received less than 2,000 votes. Wilson said the group was interested in knowing the true numbers, including the absentee ballots.

With the absentee ballots, the initiative received 2,331 votes to ratify and 1,202 not to ratify.

"You're not looking at a small number of votes — it was 600 votes," Wilson said.

Aronson said this year was the first time anyone had asked him to count absentee ballots.

"There were huge numbers of absentee ballots though, there has never been this many before," Aronson said.

The final counting of the absentee ballots did not affect the Board of Governors elections. BOG Chair George Fitzgerald said the BOG counted the absentee ballots with the rest the day after the election.

Al Lizana trounced his opponents in the contest for student trustee in the March election with 1,878 votes, not counting the absentee ballots. Jeff Turco brought in 630 votes and Kevin Jourdain only 193.

David Nunez, Lizana's running mate, became the new student government president last month after defeating Jennifer Fazzi in a 1,907 to 509 vote.

Father battles bureaucracy to save dying son

By SANDRA HERNANDEZ
Associated Press

BOSTON — Justo Ascarza has crossed borders, language barriers and poverty in the battle for his son's life.

But nearly four months after persuading U.S. doctors, hospitals and the maker of the world's costliest drug to help, Ascarza says his son's life is once again endangered.

"I understand there are laws that institutions and individuals must follow," Justo said during an interview this week in the lobby of Massachusetts General Hospital. "But as a father my responsibility is to a son whose life is withering and I must put aside protocol."

The Ascarzas arrived in Washington, D.C. last December after doctors in Lima suggested Ascarza's son, Amaru, might be suffering from Gaucher's disease, a rare metabolic disorder that causes anemia and enlargement of the liver and spleen.

Doctors at the National Institute of Health confirmed the diagnosis and Amaru was hospitalized for a brief time, said Ascarza, who understands little English. But when doctors discharged Amaru, Justo Ascarza said he "felt as if all our hopes had gone up in smoke. It was as if we had to start all over again."

At 13 years old, Amaru is about 4 feet tall, his stomach is swollen and he walks slowly. The doctors have told Justo Ascarza these are symptoms of the disease.

The 48-year-old grade school principal contacted Genzyme in a final attempt to get help. Based in Cambridge, the company manufacturers Ceredase, a drug used to treat the disease.

Currently, the average patient spends about $140,000 a year on medication according to the company. One unit of the drug costs $3.50. Doctors at the NIH recommend that people receive 60 units of the drug for every kilogram that they weigh.

Genzyme arranged to admit Amaru into a free drug program, according to company spokeswoman Donna LaVoie.

Teenage drug use on rise

By AMY YUHN
Associated Press

DETROIT - More children say they are doing drugs before reaching high school age and LSD is on the rise among 10th-graders, according to a study released Tuesday that showed both gains and losses in the war on drugs.

Marijuana use jumped a full percentage point among eighth-graders in 1992, but the most popular drugs among pre-high schoolers were so-called inhalants, potent chemicals fumes sniffed like glue, the survey found.

"It's the most widely used class of drug among eighth-graders," University of Michigan researcher Lloyd Johnston said. "I think they really don't have an understanding of the dangers of inhalants yet."

Johnston blamed complacency for the rise, which was accompanied by a drop in disapproval of drug use among the same age group.

"The nation's attention to the subject has slacked off," Johnston said.

Drug use among high school seniors dropped in every category but LSD, as did approval of drug use, the survey of eighth-, 10th-, and 12th-graders found.

For the 18th year, Johnston and colleagues Patrick M. O'Malley and Jerald G. Bachman surveyed high school seniors. About 17,000 seniors in 135 public and private schools nationwide filled out questionnaires in their classrooms.

In America's neighborhood

E.C. THOMAS

Five o'clock. As the sun sets in the background, a group of teenagers shoot hoops on a neighborhood playground. The intensity of their physical strength is mirrored in the eyes of the children, who look on with intense dreams of someday growing up to be that big, to jump that high. On the sidewalk are some girls singing as they jump rope and lovers holding hands as they take an evening stroll.

From the windows of the buildings, mothers take a moment away from dinner to gossip with one another. They stop as "Joe," the police officer, walks by, greeting him with a "hello" and, "How are the kids?" On the stoops of the brownstones sit the parents, watching their childhood be replayed for them. In their tired eyes and wrinkled skin are the stories of generations come and generations gone. The American neighborhood.

The neighborhood used to be the center of daily life, but the 5 p.m. neighborhood assembly has disappeared. The cheerful cries of children playing in the street and the buzz of mothers chatting, has been replaced by police sirens, gunfire and anxious stares for the first sign of children coming safely home. Somewhere between needles, handguns — and a videotape — that center was unraveled.

Last year's Rodney King verdict wasn't the cause of the destruction of Los Angeles' South Central neighborhood; it was the result of years of American neglect. America abandoned its cities and moved to the suburbs, leaving behind a breeding ground for poverty. The verdict didn't shape the American reality of our neighborhoods burning to the ground; it only made us turn around and smell the smoke and ashes of what we left behind.

There have always been Rodney Kings and the racism they represent, in every city, in every state; our eyes just looked the other way. Neighborhoods have been slowly burning to the ground for years, but it took a videotape, a verdict and one large, fast flame to grab our attention — at least only until the dust cleared.

Now South Central L.A. lies like an open wound in the heart of America, a wound that no one surgeon — no one verdict — could repair. And yet, America now anxiously sits in anticipation for the verdict to come down. The verdict to heal all wounds from the past and justify all the blood shed that opened it up.

A "guilty" verdict won't make everything okay, but it's the doorway to a thousand more days of repairing the American neighborhood, so long as America doesn't forget that smell of burnt history and dusty dreams as soon as the media extinguishes its spotlight.

Police officers used to walk the city block where they knew all of its families and the kids' names. Children used to look upon "Joe" coming around the corner, like they would Michael Jordan, with respect and admiration. These days kids look at police officers and run the other way. Parents look at them with the fear and distrust.

A "guilty" verdict of justice has been molded into a wand glazed with pixie dust that will touch the neighborhood and magically make everything all right. And yet, no magic wisp of a wand will ever make the gangs, the guns, the drugs and all of the violence vanish into thin air, nor will any life that has been taken by them be replaced. America needs only to open its disillusioned eyes and look upon a now childless mother's face to see the American reality in her withdrawn stare.

Article's thoughts misrepresented

I read Marc Elliott's recent column on Barbara Whitehead [Collegian, April 8] with disgust, and feel obliged to respond. I'll avoid making the sort of "ad hominum" attack he makes on Ms. Whitehead and stick to a critique of his logic.

I'm surprised he read so poorly that he saw her article as nothing more than a personal attack on him and his family. Perhaps he didn't notice that Ms. Whitehead never claimed that "all" single parent families suffer social, emotional and economic strain. His defensive, personalized response is worse than a misrepresentation of her thinking; it's irrelevant.

I myself question a number of Ms. Whitehead's conclusions, but I appreciate her thoughtful investigation of a complex issue. Mr. Elliott's poor reading, poor analysis, personalization and cheap attacks on Ms. Whitehead are a sad substitute for intellectual discourse. I'd recommend that people interested in the issues Mr. Elliott so ineptly raises, pick up this month's Atlantic and judge for themselves.

Lest Mr. Elliott dismiss me, too, as a "member of the Ph.D. patrol," I'm not even a member of his academic community — just someone who values careful reading and intellectual rigor.

LBGA suspends activities, pushes involvement

This past year the campus Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance community voted to adopt as the official motto of the LBGA: "For over 20 years working for the day when everyone is free."

This is a fitting motto because it accurately displays our community's commitment to social justice, and to meeting the needs of gay, lesbian, bisexual people at UMass.

Time and again, our community has met the challenge of justice, both politically and inter-personality. This past "awareness week" we celebrated the diversity of our community, and our belief that our collective energy and determination can meet any challenge.

For several months, the LBGA has been facing a growing twofold crisis.

First, community involvement at every level and activity has steadily declined. The 12 seat steering committee has, for nearly a year, had a core membership of four people. These four individuals cannot represent the diversity or our entire community, and our present mechanism for outreach has failed repeatedly.

Secondly, this steady decline in community involvement has resulted in a severe financial crisis and impeded our ability to function, both socially and politically. It has become painfully apparent that unless our community acts now to confront this crisis, then the continued existence of the LBGA is in peril.

This week, the steering committee of the LBGA acted to meet this crisis with the following initial steps:

First, the steering committee requested that all activities; dances, coffee socials, subgroup meetings and daily operations, be suspended.

The sole exemption to this request is the 1993 March on Washington. Bus tickets are still valid and available at the program for GLB Concerns and Food for Thought Books. This activity will in no way be disrupted by these events.

Second, the steering committee has asked for a community caucus to take place on Saturday, May 1, 1993 from 2-4 p.m. in the Campus Center. It is our hope that this forum will serve to empower our community, meet this crisis and re-define the mission of the LBGA.

The steering committee regrets that these painful measures have become necessary, but acts in the belief that our community will once again summon the courage and energy to meet a crisis, and this period of change will ensure the future success of our organization in representing gay, lesbian, bisexual undergraduates at the University of Massachusetts.

The LBGA Steering Committee

Columnist hypocritical in Twister's bar debate

For no other reason than to expose the hypocrisy of Michael Morrissey to the campus, do I write this letter. Mr. Morrissey used his space to blast the patrons and management of Twisters Tavern [Collegian, April 9]. This is not written to defend either one, but to give an account of what led Mr. Morrissey to write what he did.

It was around midnight on Sunday, April 4, when I was picking up some friends from a private party at Twisters. What I saw when leaving the bar was Michael Morrissey acting exactly like these people he wrote about in his column.

Mr. Morrissey had apparently been kicked out. Asked to leave, he started to rant and rave at the bouncer. The argument was taken outside, where he continued to very loudly barrage the bouncer with profanities. After finally leaving the premises, he proceeded to walk up and down Main Street, exposing his views on Twisters.

We drove to Antonio's; Mr. Morrissey also decided to go to Antonio's and educate everyone as to who he was and his views on the management of Twisters. His tantrum was reminiscent of my 2-year-old cousin screaming for attention.

If I may quote directly from Mr. Morrissey's column, we can see the hypocrisy involved: "[Twisters] is popular despite the fact that time and time again, its patrons have acted somewhat foolish after an evening of adult beverages at Twisters." I am sure many have, Mr. Morrissey, but don't exclude yourself from this group and present yourself as a "student advocate" for the elderly. This night, you were no more civil, than the worst of Twisters' patrons.

The most appalling part of his column is when he brings the elderly into it. Mr. Morrissey tries to gain sympathy for his argument by writing ". . . one of [the elderly's] biggest concerns at this stage of their lives is getting a quiet, peaceful night of sleep. For years now, Twisters has prevented that." I don't dispute the validity of this statement, but I can't believe Morrissey had the audacity to write it after his 12:30 a.m. tirade undoubtedly prevented these people from getting a "peaceful night of sleep."

The fact that this column was written represents a gross misuse of your power. I ask you, Mr. Morrissey, don't you have anything better to write about in your columns than the hypocritical garbage of April 9? No? Didn't think so.

Writer uninformed

I'm absolutely amazed at the lack of understanding and distortions with respect to an opinion by a Mr. Ted Chambers, who is identified as a UMass student [Collegian, April 6].

The author demonstrates that he knows little or nothing about the University's relationship with the legislature.

If he had made an effort in calling the office of the president or even the UMass Amherst campus office of state relations, he would have easily determined that each of the five campuses in the system has hosted a meeting of area legislators and that University of Massachusetts President Michael K. Hooker together with members of his staff and representatives of each of the campuses have met with virtually all of the members of the Massachusetts legislature, who are graduates of one of the UMass campuses.

He would also have been informed that the same staff people are in constant contact with both members and staff of the House and Senate Committees on Ways and Means; the Joint Committees on Education, Arts and Humanities; Health Care, Public Service, Insurance and others.

He might have also discovered that there are a number of people on the campuses who deal in campus-specific issues and several people in the office of the president who deal in system-issues with a host of agencies in the executive branch that have an enormous impact on UMass, including but not limited to funding.

Mr. Chambers would do well in emulating other students on all of the UMass campuses in doing his homework rather than "shooting from the hip."

Prison officials said the six other inmates killed has been severely beaten and slain by fellow convicts.

Late in the day Tuesday, prisoners in the L cellblock yelled to inmate in the K cellblock to join the standoff, Unwin said. Guards fired one tear gas canister into the corridor connecting the cellblocks and regained order, she said. No injuries were reported.

Talks about the inmates' list of 19 demands were "at a lull," Unwin said.

She also said little was known about the welfare of the eight guards being held hostage in the prison about 70 miles south of Columbus.

Officials believe the rebelling inmates have been monitoring broadcasts about the siege with battery-powered radios. On Tuesday, the inmates rigged a loudspeaker and announced from a cellblock window that they weren't satisfied with the negotiations.

"I'm telling you that you got problems," a voice over the loudspeaker said. "They can give us what we ask for. It's well within our rights. Then you will have someone back. Why don't they want to do this?"

The voice continued, but was drowned out by police helicopters overhead.

Corrections spokeswoman Sharron Kornegay said she have not heard the statement and could not comment.

Unwin said inmate tried another broadcast during the afternoon, but she could not hear what they said. Reporters were too far away to hear.

Ms. Kornegay would not rule out the possibility that federal agents may be asked to help negotiate or that force may be necessary to end the standoff.

"California guardsmen have been instructed that they are to use any means at their disposal to protect themselves or any other citizen if they are in threat of human death," said Maj. Gen. Tandy Bozeman.

Another military contingent was training 80 miles to the south. About 1,000 Marines at Camp Pendleton stormed a mock town as part of a "just in case" urban assault exercise.

"The 3rd Battalion, 9th Marine Regiment is on standby for any problem up there and this is a state-of-the-art training facility for them," said Cpl. Rick Rick Laemmle, a base spokesperson.

Hours after Sgt. Stacey Koon, Officers Laurence Powell and Theodore Briseno and former Officer Timothy Wind were acquitted of most charges in a state trial last April, the city erupted in violence that left 54 people dead and caused $1 billion damage.

Police under the leadership of former Chief Daryl F. Gates were criticized for their delayed response to the unrest, but new Chief Willie Williams promised protection for the city's 3.6 million residents.

"People need to be calm rather than seeing pictures of men crawling over tanks and armored vehicles," defendant Powell said. Some activists condemned the military and police buildup.

"We think that it's important that people have a continued opportunity to voice opposition," said activist lawyer B. Kwaku Duren.

In South Central Los Angeles, U.S. Rep. Maxine Waters handed out letters in her district saying, "It's time to chill."

"If you take to the streets with a Molotov cocktail in your hand, a gun in your belt or a brick ready to throw, you give the police legal right to kill you," the letters read.

Nearby, a man with "Peace" written on his T-shirt walked through his South Central neighborhood carrying a 10-foot-tall wooden cross.

"Justice, equality, human rights — that's what we don't have in this country. I'm trying to bring a message to the people: Let's not fight injury with injury, ignorance with ignorance. I'm urging peace," said 49-year-old Charles Verdun.

United States on the rampage: Iraq down, Iran to go

Again a war is brewing in the Middle East as the United States looks increasingly ready to attack Iran. At a time when the United States is trying to impose a pax-Americana on the Middle East, words of hate for Iran are spewing out of Washington. Secretary of State Warren Christopher has branded Iran an "outlaw nation" for its continued independence, determination to defend itself, and its insistence on democratic politics in the Middle East.

Iranian-U.S. relations can be described as an endless cycle of distrust and antipathy. Americans generally feel violated by Iran as if Iran had somehow "oppressed" the United States. And the truth is that the United States has been severely humiliated by the Iranian Revolution and by ongoing Iranian independence. The tension and conflict that exists between the two nations is clearly caused by U.S. hegemony in the Middle East and its continuous efforts to control Iran.

America's wanton attempts to subjugate the Iranian people began in the early '50s when the CIA overthrew Iranian democracy and installed the Shah as absolute monarch. The need to replace democratically-elected Prime Minister Mossadegh was extremely urgent after the Iranian leader led a movement to nationalize the British-owned Anglo-Iranian Oil Company, sole owner of Iranian oil. The British did not take the nationalization gracefully, regardless of the fact that the majority of the Iranian people supported Mossadegh's decision for economic reasons and national pride. However, the British would have none of it. "What they wanted was their oil company back. And they wanted Mossadegh's head." And so did the United States.

"So this is how we get rid of that madman Mossadegh," announced John Foster Dulles to a group of top Washington policy makers. A $1 million plan was created to overthrow Mossadegh, implemented by Kermit Roosevelt of the CIA. Roosevelt's plan was to replace Mossadegh with the U.S.-controlled Shah who would become one of the most terrible dictators in history.

The Shah's secret police, SAVAK, remains synonymous with brutality and torture around the world to this day. It was set up, trained, and organized primarily by the CIA and the Israeli MOSSAD (the Israeli intelligence group) to oppress and control the Iranian people while the West plundered their resources. For example, the destroyer of Iranian democracy, the CIA's Kermit Roosevelt, became vice president of Gulf Oil, a major controller of Iranian oil, under the Shah.

In the callous hands of the Shah, throughout the '50s, '60s, and '70s, Iran was used as a strategic base for the United States to continue its surveillance of the Soviet Union. Iran, South Korea and the Philipines became important political links in the chain forged by the United States to "contain" the Soviet Union.

Imperial concessions, known as capitulations, gave extra-territoral economic, diplomatic and juridical privileges to all Americans in Iran, as if they belonged to a group of people who owned Iran. Many Americans acted as if they did own it, and so did the Shah. Imam Khomeini was able to say in 1964, "If the Shah should run over an American dog, he would be called to account, but if an American cook should run over the Shah . . . no one has any claim against him."

It was during the long, brutal, proxy rule by the Shah and Americans that Imam Khomeini spoke out on behalf of the Iranian people: "Are we to be trampled underfoot by the boots of Americans simply because we are a weak nation and have no dollars? America is worse than Britain, Britain worse than America . . . but it is America that we are concerned with. Let the American president know that in the eyes of the Iranian people, he is the most repulsive member of the human race today because of the injustice he has imposed on our Muslim nation."

Sandra
ROSE

The 1978-79 Iranian Revolution freed Iran from U.S. hegemony. It was during this time that patriotic students occupied the American embassy in Teheran, holding its staff prisoners. Eventually all Americans were released unharmed.

For most Americans this was the defining moment in the relationship between the two countries, but Iranians might have a different interpretation. As Imam Khomeini pointed out when the Pope wanted to mediate for the embassy staff:

"The ears of 35 million Iranians who suffered for 50 years beneath the yoke of imperialism and repression — particularly American imperialism — as well as the ears of millions of oppressed people throughout the world, have constantly been straining to hear expression of sympathy on the part of the Pope, or at least some indication of paternal concern for the state of the oppressed, coupled with an admonishment of the tyrants and oppressors, or a desire to mediate between the oppressed peoples and those superpowers that profess to be Christian. But our ears have never heard any such expression of sympathy or concern. Our people were massacred for 50 years, and the best sons and daughters of our nation were thrown into inhuman prisons where they died under brutal tortures. Yet the question of mediation never arose, nor did it ever occur to His Eminence, the Pope, to show any concern for our oppressed people or even to mediate with the plea that oppression cease."

Since then, the United States has continued a hostile attitude towards Iran. For example, in the mid-'80s, an American warship shot down an Iranian civilian airbus without warning or mercy. Hundreds of passengers were brutally slaughtered by the U.S. navy in this cowardly terrorist act — innocents plunging to their doom in the Persian Gulf.

Iran has joined the ranks of smaller nations despised in America for having defeated it, like North Korea, Cuba and Vietnam. Beyond that, Iran serves as an example to other smaller states of the possibility of independence.

Since the Iranian Revolution a new kind of Muslim politics has been growing throughout the Arab world such as Hamas in Palestine, FIS in Algeria, Hisbullah in Lebannon, and various Muslim groups in Egypt. It is these groups that threaten widespread anti-imperial revolution in the Middle East and constitute the national liberation movements of Islam comparable to Latin American liberation theology.

The future of the Middle East is being contested from two local centers, Cairo and Teheran. The Egyptian vision accepts pax-Americana, sees it coming from a Cairo/Ryadh axis, and emphasizes stability and the status quo. This is also the American vision. A different vision emerges from Teheran, including the dominance of Islamic politics, full regional control of resources, no U.S. hegemony and a new status quo.

Although not directly the same as the Iranian Revolution, Arab Muslim politics finds itself in large agreement with Iran on many points. As Imam Khomeini stated, "If the Muslim states and people relied on Islam instead of relying on the Eastern or Western bloc — had placed before their eyes the luminous and liberating teachings of the Noble Qu'ran, and then practiced those teachings — they would not be enslaved by the Zionist aggressors, terrorized by American Phantoms and at the mercy of the satanic cunning of the Soviet Union."

The fundamental difference between these visions can be gauged from the simple fact that while the American vision is anti-democratic. The strongest regional proponent of democracy in the Middle East is Iran. This fact [uncomfortable for those who imagine the United States favoring democracy and Iran favoring Muslim tyranny] has been openly acknowledged by many important U.S. analysists. For example, ex-CIA chief and Secretary of Defense James Slesinger has recently admitted that "Indeed, in the Middle East the Islamic state that has most successfully embraced democratic processes is none other than Iran."

These two visions, the democratic verses the imperialist, are totally incompatible. It seems clear that the greatest threat to "regional stability" comes from Muslim politics. For this reason it seems quite likely that the United States will feel the need to attack Iran as it had attacked Iraq. The lessons are the same — no independent regional power can be tolerated in the Middle East by the Americans.

It seems clear that out of imperialistic aggression and the desire for bitter revenge, the temptation to attack Iran may prove too great for the United States to resist. Excuses for attacking Iran may involve Iranian defense programs, territorial disputes in the Persian Gulf or any number of manufactured incidents. But it seems clear that no matter the excuse, the drive towards war with Iran is reaching the point of no return.

South Africa, apartheid and the murder of a statesman

A football stadium is filled with thousands of men, women and children. They had been marching all day carrying signs that read, "Stop Apartheid Now," singing songs of freedom, each step drawing them closer to the day South Africa would be theirs once again. As hero after hero speaks from the rostrum in the center, their passions rise as visions of smiling Black children not ravaged by apartheid crystallize in the mind.

A gate left open leads into the Bantustan of Ciscie. Surging forward with pride and nationalism, the crowd marches through the gate into a part of their nation that would keep them out. In the long grass the troops wait, crouched like big cats. As the singing patriots march forward, the White officers give the signal, "Open Fire!" In a hail of bullets, hundreds fall bleeding to the ground.

Another massacre in the history of atrocities that make up the past and present of South Africa.

Swanieville '92: 28 dead, more than 100 wounded.

Boipathong June, '92: 42 killed.

Alexandria March, '91: 13 killed, 17 wounded.

Sebokong January, '91: 38 people dead.

Jeppe Station Massacre September, '90: 32 shot to death.

Since September 1990: 7,000 people dead.

Apartheid, by far the most barbaric and brutal system of institutionalized racism (surpassed only by the state of Israel), is alive and functioning in the so-called "Republic of South Africa." Twenty eight million children, women and men are bereft of political and economic rights, while the "powers that be" in the international community mouth platitudes, condoning it all the way.

Shyamala
IVATURY

Millions of Africans have been uprooted from their homelands with little or no compensation and relocated to one of 10 isolated Bantustans, which are mostly infertile and barren lands (The conditions of Black South Africans are similar to that of the Palestinians in the occupied territories).

The White ruling regime owns 87 percent of the land, including the commercial, manufacturing and agricultural areas in South Africa. Black Africans are only allowed into the White "nation" as laborers. Homelessness, hunger, disease and high unemployment are rampant in the among the Black majority. Laws are applied selectively in a land where justice has no meaning.

In townships like Soweto, Sharpville, and Maokeng, poorly constructed dingy shacks with barely any water, electricity, or sewage house Black South Africans. These residents are subjected to frequents raids by death squads, the Askaris, and other units from the South African police and the South African Defesne Force. Fire bombs, lootings, and mysterious disappearances are commonplace. In contrast, the adjacent White cities of Johannesburg, Pretoria and Durban are filled with palatial houses, complete with swimming pools, three car garages and lush gardens.

Israel-South Africa: the unholy alliance

Apartheid continues in South Africa in part because of the hypocrisy of the West. The United States and its allies oppose it with nothing but empty rhetoric. Although the White South African leadership was sympathetic to Nazi Germany and harbors ex-Nazis, the alliance between South Africa and Israel has been cemented. Both settler colonial states were created to serve "Western interests." In the words of an African National Congress member, "The steel is from South Africa, but the bullets are from Tel Aviv."

Israel imports goods worth almost $200 million per year from South Africa. Israeli Ribbutzim and the General Labor Union, the Histadrut, have substantial investments in South Africa. South Africa reciprocates by holding an estimated 35 percent of all non-U.S. investment in the Israeli economy. Through joint ventures and middlemen, Israel is the major supplier for military technology and weapons to South Africa. In 1962 Israel received 10 tons of uranium from South Africa and by the 1970s both countries were collaborating in the development of their nuclear program. Both radical racist states have manufactured large numbers of nuclear weapons in collaboration. Washington has predictably chosen to ignore the Israel/South African nuclear connection.

The alliance between Tel Aviv and Pretoria is sanctioned by the U.S. government. The U.S. has provided Israel with aid amounting to $36 billion since 1973 in American taxpayers' money. It is clear that the United States has used Israel to enabilize apartheid to survive in South Africa by covert means.

De Klerk's Regime

F.W. De Klerk came to power at a time when the countries economy was spiralling downward, under the impact of sanctions. Local governments had collapsed and a state of emergency had been declared. Furthermore, in the mid-'80s Black resistance was unprecedented. The Inkathagak scandal revealed that the government was funding the leader of the Zulu's Chief Mangosu thu Gatsha Buthelezi and his Inkatha Freedom Party (IFP) in an effort to split the Blacks by fomenting violence. The Bush administration sent over $2 million in U.S. tax dollars to fund IFP.

The De Klerk government was forced to further unfold the process of reform.

The ANC, the South African Communist Party (SACP) and the Pan-African Congress (PAC) were legalized after almost 30 years of having been underground. Nelson Mandela was released from Robin Island after 27 years.

Apart from making a few cosmetic changes in the laws, the White ruling regime has done nothing to dismantle the core socio-economic structures of apartheid.

A framework for negotiations convention for a democratic South Africa (CODESA) was set up in December 1991 to discuss the dismantling of apartheid and the setting up of an interim government, non-racial elections and so on. The multiparty talks at CODESA are attended

UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AT AMHERST
Office of the Dean of Students

To the Campus Community:

The murder of University senior Tara Hartnett on March 20 is a tragedy that is magnified by the shocking prevalence of violence against women in our society. As we move through our grief, it is our responsibility as an educational community to renew our commitment to addressing relationship violence and related issues of sexual abuse.

The material reprinted on these pages constitutes an introduction to understanding relationship violence and its effect upon each of us, especially the women who are overwhelmingly its targets. For more information, we urge you to contact one or more of the resources listed here.

We must work together to stop violence in our classrooms, workplaces, homes and campus environment. Only the collaborative efforts of students, faculty and staff can foster the changes in behavior and values that will create a safe campus for all of us.

Sincerely,

Jo-Anne Thomas Vanin

The Cycle of Violence

Battered women are not constantly being abused nor does battering occur at totally random times. Abuse is inflicted in a recurring battering cycle that is comprised of three distinct phases:

Phase I: Tension-Building. Gradual increase in name calling, criticism, verbal harassment, psychological humiliation, pushing, hitting and sexual abuse. The batterer appears to have some control over his actions in these incidents.

Phase II: Acute Battering Incident. A sudden outbreak of more severe, uncontrollable violence. The woman sustains more severe physical injuries in this phase. This phase is shorter in duration than Phase I or III, usually lasting from 2-24 hours.

Phase III: Loving-Contrite Period. The batterer is remorseful and may shower the woman with gifts, apologies, and promises never to hurt her again. The loving behavior can reinforce a woman's hope that the batterer will change. In some relationships there are no loving behaviors, but only an absence of violence.

In time, Phase III gives way to the incidents of Phase I. The cycle begins again and over time will increase in frequency and intensity.

What Is Abuse?

ABUSE is slapping, kicking, hitting, shoving, using any instrument as a weapon. ABUSE is any physical violation, including sex, against your will. ABUSE is a verbal threat and/or physical attempts to hurt. ABUSE IS BEING IN SO MUCH FEAR, YOU FEEL INCAPABLE TO CHANGE. ABUSE can be physical and/or emotional. If you are constantly in fear, put down, called names, told you are crazy, incompetent and/or stupid, you are emotionally abused. If you have not been able to leave the abusive situation because of economic reasons, you are not alone.

Obstacles to Leaving an Abusive Partner or Why a Woman is Not to Blame for Staying in a Dangerous Relationship

DANGER:
-- Increase in violence, or threats of escalated violence or death.
-- Abuser's threats of suicide, withdrawal of child-support, violence against children or others.
-- Threats from abuser that she will lose custody of the children; accusations that she is an unfit partner.
-- The possibility/fear of losing custody of children may be greater due to heterosexism, racism, and/or classism.
-- Fear that public knowledge of abuse will reinforce racist, classist and/or heterosexist stereotypes.

PRESSURE
-- Social, religious or family pressure to keep a family, marriage or relationship together, resulting in guilt, blame, judgment.
-- Embarrassment and shame; not wanting to be judged by others.
-- Pressure to put up with abuse - minimizing the abuse, lack of emotional support, pressure to protect abuser from public accountability.

MANIPULATION
-- Low self-esteem resulting from emotional, sexual and/or physical abuse.
-- Feelings of helplessness, lack of control over own life.
-- Forced social isolation or fear of being lonely or undesirable.
-- Self-blame or guilt; belief that she may deserve abuse.
-- Possible history of abuse as a child, leading to expectation or acceptance of abuse in relationships.
-- Influence of a cycle of violence; the hope that the abuser will change based on a pattern of abuse followed by false promises and apologies. In this cycle the abuse always continues and generally gets worse as long as the relationship remains intact.

LACK OF RESOURCES
-- Financial dependence on abuser and/or limited job skills or personal financial resources.
-- Lack of culturally appropriate and/or accessible support services for women of color and/or women who are disabled and/or lesbian.
-- Lack of sufficient physical strength to escape danger as a result of repeated injury or illness from abuse.
-- Failure of adequate police and court intervention.

STRATEGIES FOR A SAFE AND FUN SOCIAL LIFE

You have the right to choose what feels comfortable and appropriate to you in social situations, in your own time and in your own way. No one has the right to force or pressure you to do anything.

Trust your instincts. If a situation begins to feel uncomfortable or unsafe to you in any way, you have a right to act in the interest of your safety. No effort to remain safe is exaggerated or unnecessary, even if it feels awkward. Many women who have been assaulted reported having a "bad feeling" before an attack occurred.

Note your feelings as indications of what you are comfortable with. Watch out for statements that minimize your feelings, ie, "why are you/am I making such a big deal out of this (being so uptight/paranoid/moody/etc.)?" And remember, being assertive does not mean you are acting "bitchy" or "mean." It means you respect your feelings and expect that others will do so as well.

Be a good friend to yourself. The more you treat yourself with respect on a daily basis, even in what might seem like little ways, the more prepared you will be to negotiate threatening or potentially dangerous situations. A self-defense class designed for women can increase your awareness of options available to you if you are confronted with danger. This experience can also help you regain a sense of control and self esteem if you have been victimized in the past.

You can't always avoid danger, but you can act on your own behalf in many ways in any situation. If you are or have been raped, it is not your fault. Rape is the failure of the rapist to respect another person's human right. Nobody asks or deserves to be raped.

Women are the leaders of the movement to end violence against women. Use your individual skills and talents to help end forms of violence which degrade us all. For more information on how to get involved, call your local women's center, rape crisis or battered women's program.

Myths and Facts

MYTH: Most incidents of battering are not much more than a push or slap; the woman is rarely hurt.

FACT: Battering is a leading cause of injury to women. Attacks on women have included pushing, shoving, hitting, punching, kicking, choking, strangulation, biting, scalding, raping, attacks and threats to harm with guns, knives, household objects and cars.

MYTH: Battering most commonly occurs among minority groups and lower income people.

FACT: Battering cuts across both class and racial lines. The statistics can be misleading since poor women are more likely to seek emergency shelter while middle and upper class women may have access to other resources.

MYTH: A woman who is beaten must have provoked the violence.

FACT: No woman asks or deserves to be beaten. Men who batter use physical violence as a way of gaining control and power over others. The responsibility for violence does not lie in the woman's behavior.

MYTH: Battered women are masochistic or else they would leave.

FACT: No woman enjoys being beaten. Many women stay because the batterer threatens worse harm to her or her children or threatens suicide if she tries to leave. Sometimes women stay because they are financially dependent on their partner. In addition, the emotional abuse inflicted with battering may convince a woman that she doesn't have the ability to care of herself and her children outside the relationship. Finally, she may stay because she cares for her partner, believes his promises to change and doesn't want to break up the family.

by 19 parties, 17 of which are tied with the ruling class.

A stumbling block in CODESA has been the National Party's stance on "power-sharing." The White minority is demanding equal partnership with the ANC. This concept is being sold by De Klerk's National Party as the "protection of minority right within South Africa." Absurd, but nonetheless true.

Above all De Klerk is ensuring that the economic control remains in the hands of the White minority. The economy is being privatized and austerity measures have been imposed even before structural adjustment. Slowly but steadily South Africa is being pushed into the clutches of the IMF and World Bank.

Despite the signing of the National Peace Accord in 1991, violence is unabated. Low intensity warfare continues. Last week's assassination of Chris Hani former Chief of Staff of the Umkhonto we Sizwe, the military wing of the ANC, and Secretary General of the SACP is a grim reminder of the situation in South Africa. The assassination of one of the most popular and militant young leaders seems like yet another attempt to forestall CODESA and escalate violence by "selective assassination of the enemies of apartheid."

Moderate Whites in South Africa seem prepared to shed their atavistic racism as long as they can maintain economic control. There seems to be a concerted effort on part of the National Party and De Klerk to stretch negotiations as long as possible. The alternate scenario of a generalized civil war with the centers breaking down is neither in the interest of the ANC nor the National Party.

It is only a matter of time before this irrational, inhumane system of apartheid will crumble and the hopes and dreams of the Blacks in South Africa will be realized.

Mass. writer draws acclaim

Martha's Vineyard resident receives Pulitzer Prize

WEST TISBURY (AP) — David McCullough joined the ranks Tuesday of the writers he said were his role models as an author.

McCollough won the 1993 Pulitzer Prize for the biography of "Truman."

"I don't think there's any more important tribute that a writer can receive," said McCullough, a year-round resident of Martha's Vineyard.

The award came on the anniversary of his subject's first day in office: April 13, 1945.

Truman became a mainstay of last summer's presidential campaign; both candidates, Democrat Bill Clinton and Republican George Bush, had read McCullough's book.

"It was the first time ever in the history of our politics that both candidates of both parties had resorted to the same book," he said.

McCollough, 59, said the Pulitzer announcement was "the best news I ever received in my writing life. It was right out of the blue. I'm just thrilled."

"Truman" also was nominated for the National Book and Critics Circle awards.

"I've had my fingers crossed and everybody kept telling me this book should win the Pulitzer Prize," he said. "I didn't want them to be saying that, because I'm superstitious.

McCullough also is host of the public television series "American Experience," narrated the series "The Civil War" and host of "Smithsonian World."

He said his role models were historians and biographers and fellow Pulitzer Prize winners, such as Barbara Tuchman and Wallace Stegner.

He also is the author of "The Johnstown Flood," for which he won the National Book Award in 1978; "The Path Between the Seas," about the creation of the Panama Canal; "The Great Bridge," the story of the building of the Brooklyn Bridge; and "Mornings on Horseback," a biography of the young Theodore Roosevelt.

Justice pledges hold on closure

WARE (AP) — The head of the state's district courts said Tuesday he has suspended a plan to end operations in Ware and pledged to keep all other courthouses staffed for now.

However, Chief Justice Samuel E. Zoll also held out the prospect of consolidating some functions in the future.

Local leaders and activists, who have been battling to save Ware District Court, cheered his decision.

"It's our only lifeline in the whole of western Massachusetts," said Gerard Mallet, chief selectman. "We have a very big drug problem and a very big criminal problem that's coming to a head now, and our only outlet is the court."

Arrests for violent crimes in this old mill town of about 10,000 residents shot up from 43 in 1991 to 83 last year, according to Police Chief Stanley Mettig.

Yet Zoll announced the plan in September to transfer all workers from Ware to Palmer District Court. He said an administrative hiring freeze had left state staffing at 80 percent, and workers were swamped by a swelling case load at the new court in Palmer, eight miles from Ware.

Only the state legislature can formally close a district court, but Zoll's move would have, in effect, shut down the court in Ware.

Zoll said Tuesday that the hiring freeze had left state staffing at 80 percent, and workers were swamped by a swelling case load at the new court in Palmer, eight miles from Ware.

Only the state legislature had reasserted its desire to keep courthouses open for now in court reform legislation this year.

"At the current moment, I am not contemplating making a recommendation that there be a resumption of the consolidation talk," he said of Ware District Court. "The plan is in suspension."

He said he had been considering similar ideas for other courthouses, though no specific plans were announced. Those proposals have also been shelved, he said.

Despite that decision, Zoll said that the district court network, where defendants first enter the criminal justice system, is still hard pressed by growing case loads after years of tight funding. He said 19 of 166 posts for judges are now vacant, and about 600 of 2,800 staff positions are empty. There are 68 district courts across the state.

"We may have to substantially cut down sessions in a number of places, and the places we don't have the luxury of cutting down sessions are in major urban areas," he said.

But Stephen E. Grandlund, a Ware resident who has campaigned to keep the court, said the suspension means easier access to help for the town's neediest people. "The protective services of the court, which protects the needs of battered women, abused and neglected children, and the elderly, are as important and, in some cases, more important than the criminal justice mechanism in the court building," he said.

Poetic gangsters, ice-pick killers on HSCN

By EDWARD W. HUMPHRIES
Collegian Staff

It's the big screen extravaganzas of years past that dominate HSCN this coming week. Sequels rule the airwaves as roman numeral installments continuing the adventures of Eddie Murphy's Beverly Hills cop Axel Foley and Bruce Willis' terrorist tackler John McClane bid to up the ante with greater explosions and stratospheric levels of carnage.

Squeezed in among these blockbuster behemoths, smaller films like Garry Marshall's The Flamingo Kid and the Max von Sydow (The Seventh Seal) showcase Pelle the Conquerer vie for recognition, and deservedly so. And for those who like their thrills dumb and uninspired, Single White Female Jennifer Jason Leigh does the "roomate from hell" thing while Godzilla 1985 chomps scenery like so many model bullet trains. It's quite a mixed bag on HSCN this week.

Love Crimes — Not worth seeing — barely worth reviewing, this is a dreadful piece of trash masquerading as a taut psychological thriller that only succeeds in showing just how far star Sean Young's career has fallen. Focusing on the perverse relationship that develops between reporter Young and a stalker-cum-photographer played by Sleeping with the Enemy's Patrick Bergin, this film lays out all the slasher movie conventions but nothing else. The main surprise in this film is not Young's horrible performance, but actually how misogynistic this film comes across seeing that it is helmed by female director Lizzie Borden. D-

Miller's Crossing — Directors Joel and Ethan Coen have fashioned an incredibly stylish film that focuses on the Irish and Italian mobs and the interactions between the many diverse characters that embody each group. Gabriel Byrne plays Tommy, an honest guy "who just doesn't bump other guys," involved with the wrong woman and the wrong people while trying to maintain his innocence in a world where everything isn't what it seems. Brimming with irony, the Coen brothers film is a lyrical and poetic take on the mobster genre, featuring inspired cinematography by Barry Sonnenfield and engaging supporting performances by John Polito, Albert Finney and John Turturro. One of the best and most creative gangland dramas ever. A-

Awakenings — The courageous work of physician Oliver Saks provides the basis for this 1990 Penny Marshall film, that focuses on Saks' miraculous awakening of people afflicted with "sleeping sickness" through the use of the experimental drug L-Dopa.

Marshall directs with a nostalgic eye to the details of the mid-'60s and presents a cliched but heart-tugging tale. Stand out performances by Robert DeNiro and a low-key, but affecting Robin Williams as the doctor steer, this film away from a standard "disease of the week" T.V. movie route. B+

Basic Instinct — O.K. this movie is trash, but it's vastly entertaining trash that's pumped up with impressive visuals and incredibly over-the-top sex scenes. It's habitually watchable (at least when viewed in my stereotypical "dumb guy" phase). Though I may sound very un-PC the incredibly ravenous Sharon Stone presides over this movie with an ice pick. She easily steals scenes from co-star Michael Douglas and turns in one of the strongest female characters of last year, clearly establishing herself as the reigning actress in Hollywood.

Director Paul Verhoeven clearly knows that sex and violence (and lots of it) sell in America. He lays it on with a vengeance in this tale of a murder investigation centering on Stone's bisexual novelist Catherine Trammell. Though it deserves no awards, this film remains an entertaining guilty pleasure. B

City Slickers — Buddies Billy Crystal, Daniel Stern and Bruno Kirby hit the trails of the west in an old fashioned cattle drive in this comedic exploration of middle-age angst. Crystal, Stern and Kirby each earn their share of laughs in Ron Underwood's male bonding extravaganza. However, it's veteran Old West fixture Jack Palance who truly steals the show as the sullen trail boss Curly who teaches Crystal to look into himself to find his happiness. B+

COURTESY TWENTIETH CENTURY FOX
Gabriel Byrne (l.) and Marcia Gay Harden star in "Miller's Crossing."

Die Hard II — With its absurd premise aside, this sequel to the 1988 surprises smash Die Hard actually spins a good adventure yarn with a decent amount of plot twists thrown in for good measure. Director Renny Harlin ups the ante by stranding displaced New York cop John McClane in Washington's Dulles International Airport, coincidentally as a disgruntled Army colonel (William Sadler) awaits the unauthorized extradition of an incoming drug kingpin. With greater pyrotechnics and a delightfully villainous turn by Sadler (Bill and Ted's Bogus Journey), this film is an action packed second installment that enhances the excitement of the original. B+

Frankie and Johnny — Though its hard to take Michelle Pheiffer as a down-trodden frumpy New York waitress, her radiance consistently defies this description, overall she gives a wonderful performance as a woman weary of love in the hectic ways of the '90s. Al Pacino, showing glimmers of his boisterous attitude in Scent of a Woman, is good as Pheiffer's ex-con suitor Johnny who works hard to win her affection in Garry Marshall's modern fairy tale based on the play of the same name. Boasting a supporting cast featuring Hector Elizondo, Frances Sternhagen and Nathan Lane (who held the title role in the Broadway play), Marshall's treatment is a charming N.Y. love story that takes its time at love and succeeds. B

The Hunt for Red October — Faced with the impossible task of crafting a mid-80s Cold War thriller just as the Berlin War began to fall, Director John McTiernan has avoided translating this Tom Clancy bestselling thriller into an action genre antiquity thanks to good performances by Alec Baldwin as CIA analyst Jack Ryan and Sean Connery as the Soviet sub captain Marko Ramius, who's defection kicks off a worldwide search and destroy mission and fuels the rising tensions between the Soviet and

Eric Morrell: shattering the Greek mythology

Student speaks out about fraternity life, stereotypes

JESSICA TAVERNA / COLLEGIAN
Eric Morrell

Editor's Note: This is a profile of Eric Morrell, former head of the Inter-Fraternity Council at UMass. The Collegian spoke with Eric about being a brother and Greek life on campus.

By ADAM SCOTT ROBERTS
Collegian Staff

ASR: What was the initial force that pushed you in the direction to seek out joining a fraternity here at UMass?

Eric Morrell: I came to the University of Massachusetts not knowing what I was going to get involved with. Was I gonna go Greek? Was I gonna be involved in this group? And I decided that the Greek system was an interesting place to be involved in, a lot of things were going on. I saw parties. I saw what they did during Greek Week. And I really wanted to see what it was all about and get involved and get something that would bring me a tight group of friends and a good bond.

ASR: So, this wasn't something premeditated, you realized this at school?

EM: It definitely wasn't a premeditated thing. I was really impressed by going around to all the different houses during formal rush and seeing what they had to offer. I wasn't thinking of going Greek and they kind of convinced me to. I really, really liked what they had to offer and I thought I could add something to the Greek area and the fraternity that I pledged.

ASR: Did you wait a semester before rushing or did you rush during your first semester?

EM: The first semester I got here I was a little more apprehensive and I wanted to get a feel for the University and see what it was all about. I really didn't want to just jump right in on the Greek scene so I waited a semester and went through formal rush. I narrowed it down to two and then decided on Sigma Alpha Mu.

ASR: Eric, could you please describe what it means to be a brother and then could you describe the concept of brotherhood to me?

EM: O.K. Well, a brother in a fraternity is someone that you feel close with, someone you are attached too. You've done certain things together to create this bond and it's someone that you can just spend time with. You get that close bond in all different aspects. And that is brotherhood.

ASR: How does this differ from the close bond that you may have with a floormate or your friend, let's say from the football team?

EM: It's a different kind of bond because you all know that you worked to be in a fraternity. You've gone through a pledge program and worked to join the brotherhood and to earn the respect of the brothers and it just makes you feel closer. It's a tighter feeling.

ASR: What do you mean that you worked at this tighter bond?

EM: Basically a pledge program is a microcosm of the fraternity. It is comprised of 10 to 15 guys in a pledge class and each person has a position. Someone will be in charge of a philanthropy chair, social chair, historian chair, fund-raising and someone will be the treasurer. These are the examples: philanthropy: they raise money for the American Heart Association; fund-raising: they'll raise money so we can have the pledge party for the brotherhood. They all work together to a common bond so someday they can eventually be involved in the fraternity and be a brother.

ASR: So, pledging gets the pledges closer to one another so once they're activated, they already have a bond and therefore they're more comfortable within the infrastructure?

EM: Right. Once they go through pledging they're very close with their pledge class. After they become a brother, the pledge class starts bonding with the rest of the fraternity and then we become a big brotherhood.

ASR: What was the most important thing that you have gained from being a brother?

EM: One thing? I think I've learned a lot about being responsible and that you should take an active voice in the things that you do. If there is something that's going on that you want to be involved in, basically, you address that and get involved in it. I've learned to speak very well like at a Inter-Fraternity Council meeting. I've learned a lot of that spontaneous-type of interaction with other people in meetings and groups.

ASR: This past year you served as head of the IFC for men's fraternity rush. What exactly did you do for the Greek community in that position?

EM: I organized two semesters of formal rush. I made

Digable Planets are Reachin'

By CALEB COCHRAN

Reachin' (a new refutation of time and space)
Digable Planets
Pendulum Records

If you want documented proof of just how diverse the genre of rap music has become, you need look no further than the new group Digable Planets and their debut album, Reachin' (a new refutation of time and space).

The album is a refreshing sample of pleasant and soothing hip-hop sounds. Culturally aware and musically entrancing, Reachin' is a brilliantly original collection.

"Where I'm From" was the first song I ever heard from the Planets (on "David Letterman" a while back) and it remains my favorite. Lyrics flow naturally and skillfully from the mouths of Butterfly, Doodle Bug and Ladybug on this enjoyable tune which is representative of the group's feel-good sound and philosophy.

"What Cool Breezes Do" is a peaceful plea to listeners to "Do what you feel." As are many songs on Reachin', this tune is relaxing, inspirational and thought-provoking all at once.

One track which may be familiar to readers is "Rebirth of Slick (Cool Like Dat)."

"The song parallels the jazz and hip-hop cultures," says Butterfly, founder of Digable Planets. "In its heyday, jazz had its vernacular and clothes; similarly, we have our own styles, art, attitude, plus a language that's almost incomprehensible if you're not part of it."

"Jimmi Diggin' Cats" refers to, as the title would suggest, Jimi Hendrix. "Jimi Hendrix is always a reminder to me that art has no math or science," says Butterfly. "Here's a cat who was reaching all the time — that was cool to us. Art is whatever an artist says it is. Jimi, if he was around today, he would dig rap." The tune includes some humorous lyrics, including a reference to "8-track Walkmans." It's yet another of the very original and enjoyable tunes on the album.

A man's view of an abortion situation is discussed in "La Femme Fatal." The story within the song is sure to provoke thought and debate. "It's not a pro-abortion song, because we celebrate life every day we live," Butterfly says. "But the key line is, 'life doesn't stop after birth.'"

The album is chock-full of brilliant songs. Others include "Escapism (Gettin' Free)," "Appointment at the Fat Clinic," and "Time & Space (a new refutation of)."

"We try to make sounds that are nice to listen to," says Butterfly. With Reachin', Digable Planets have certainly accomplished that goal. If Arrested Development was the best new rap group of 1992, Digable Planets has got to be the early favorite for that award in 1993. Creative and refreshingly different, Reachin' will have you humming the sweet sounds of Digable Planets long after the music is over.

U.S. militaries that add the backbone to this espionage action piece. Clancy fans will be pleased with the film's faithfulness to the novel and those unfamiliar will enjoy this undersea chase saga, further enhanced by McTiernan's claustrophobic atmosphere of suspense. B+ sure rush rules were followed correctly. We do not have any alcohol at any rush event. I was in charge of advertising and printing up a rush booklet where each house had articles.

ASR: How has being a fraternity brother changed your life?

EM: Well, I think that most of my closest friends in this school are my fraternity brothers and I know they'll always be there in the future for me. Basically, I also learned a lot about myself by living with 50 people that are a lot like me. I also know that a lot of the guys in my fraternity I'll be friends with or close friends with for the rest of my life. I mean your pledge brothers, most of them, you're close with for the rest of your life. I know my pledge brother will be at my wedding.

ASR: Name two misconceptions about being a fraternity man that you would like to dispel?

EM: First of all a lot of people think that fraternities are a bunch of beer-drinking, loud, obnoxious people. The fraternities of the Greek Area are very responsible people. Another myth is that fraternities are buying groups of friends; it's basically not that. You go to a fraternity and you see what these different fraternities have to offer and you find a fraternity that is like you and you say that you want to be involved in that. It has nothing to do with buying a group of friends; they are like you and you want to enjoy what they're enjoying now and get involved with what they're involved with now.

ASR: So, it's no different than a summer camp or a teen tour, where you pay a membership or participation fee.

EM: No. It's very different than that because you aren't paying for your friends at all. There is a fee to take part in the active events that go on like different day to day things. Also, the fees help keep the house afloat.

ASR: It is to my understanding that your fraternity was the first house to implement a designated driver program. What made the brothers of your house decide this was something that you needed to address?

EM: Well, the impetus was from a brother in the fraternity that had a little drunk driving experience and he came to the fraternity and said he wanted to start a designated driver program, and we thought it was an excellent idea. It was brought up to the executive board of the fraternity and with the help of the rest of the exec-board instituted a designated driver program. One brother is responsible one night a year for driving people home from wherever they are, a friend's house, if there at a bar, at the fraternity. . . It has been going very successfully and I served on it last weekend and drove 10 people home and I feel it's a great thing and it's a really helpful program for the fraternity.

ASR: Why do you think there are stereotypes about Greeks? Is it the media?

EM: I think a lot of the stigmas about fraternities are what people see on the outside. They see a movie like, Animal House and Revenge of the Nerds and they see a bunch of parting crazy kids. But, once you're involved in it and realize all the aspects that aren't seen from the outside: all the positive and excellent opportunities a fraternity offers. The stigma is definitely a superficial surface. It's what people see on the outside. You really have to be in it to understand.

ASR: What is Greek Week and when does it happen?

EM: Greek Week is when all the fraternities and sororities get together. It's a fun time, everyone gets close; there is a lot of bonding. We play games, and it lasts for a week in the spring, this year it is April 26 to May 2.

ASR: If you could tell non-greeks one reason why they should consider joining a fraternity or sorority what would you tell them?

EM: I told my sister and all of my friends from home the Greek Area has a lot to offer. It has friendship. It has places to be involved in leadership abilities, it has a chance to give something back to your school and your community. It has an excellent social life. I think every one should check fraternities out and see what they have to offer and see what they are all about.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Show your affection for someone by lending a helping hand. Opportunities for working more closely with your business associates abound. Be open to suggestions.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): The work atmosphere should be aired and agreements reached. Creative ventures and romantic pursuits can prove lucky. You and a friend should find a secluded place to be alone.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Your gift for gab is a big plus now. Use it to persuade other people to do their fair share. When you turn on the charm, resistance melts away. Make a doctor's appointment.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Chats with your kin can unearth new financial resources. A misunderstanding will be quickly cleared up by your honesty. Teamwork speeds progress.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Higher-ups will eventually favor your ideas if you are both persistent and consistent. Financial problems prove easier to solve. Romance takes on a new glow.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Do not be shy about asking for help in righting a wrong. Telling the whole story will produce the best results. Creditors may be helpful if you inform them how things really stand.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Confidential information received from a friend should be carefully evaluated before it is used. A happy romance brings you true contentment. A new career or business venture will thrive.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Travel is fine but make sure you have a specific plan. Repair noisy furniture. Your cash flow could be reduced. Provide a worker with job leads.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Keep a low profile today and try not to argue with people who irritate you. Just pull in your horns. Your kindness to your loved ones will be repaid.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Travel, creative projects and people at a distance all contribute to higher profits now. You thrive during this expansive period. Plan to lunch at a restaurant off the beaten track.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): If asked for advice, share your own experiences. A few constructive suggestions will do more than a long winded lecture. A loved one's actions will surprise and delight you.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March. 20): An income boost is likely if you stick to your true talents. Refuse to take sides when quarrels arise between your co-workers. Open new channels of communication with family members.

salary cap to seriously challenge the big money Green Bay offered.

White said he wanted to play for a team committed to winning, a team that could go to the Super Bowl, The Niners and Skins have combined for seven Super Bowl victories in the last twelve years. Over the same twelve years, either Washington or San Fran has participated in the NFC championship game eleven times.

The Packers rarely make the playoffs, but White felt they had a better chance to win than the two teams that have dominated the NFL since 1980? Money talks, Reggie, forget about "commitment to winning."

Today's players are bigger, smarter, and faster than their predecessors, unfortunately there is something missing. They just don't make them like they used to. It is a sad day for the NFL: the spirit of the word "teamwork" has left the league, with players signing elsewhere for more money over more years.

Despite spending most of the season in second and third place, the Bruins have peaked at the right time to surge past Montreal and Quebec to move into first place. They clinched the division by beating Montreal handily in the Forum on Saturday.

The key to the Bruins surge? Defense and the stellar goal tending of Andy Moog. Ray Bourque has played like the Ray Bourque of old, while Don Sweeney, David Shaw and Gord Roberts have been huge contributers. The combination has been effective in shutting down some of the NHL's premier offenses.

A word of warning to the NHL: Slow down expansion. Back in the seventies, franchises like the Cleveland Barons, California Golden Seals, and Colorado Rockies began playing. These franchises were utter disasters. The NHL which is trying to improve its image and expand its fan base would be dealt a huge blow if any of these franchises fail.

Things are looking up if you're a Whaler fan, and judging from their attendance at home games, I'm speaking to a limited audience here. Although some hockey insiders had speculated that the Whalers might relocate to Houston or Minnesota, it looks like NHL hockey will remain in "insurance land" after all. Connecticut Gov. Lowell Weiker has proposed that the state purchase the Hartford Civic Center in order to keep the Whalers in Hartford.

I'd like to tip my hat to the North Stars fan who dumped beer on owner Norm Green during a recent North Stars game. Green is ditching the Twin Cities area and bringing the Stars to Dallas.

The Miami expansion team is likely going to be called the Panthers. A $50 wager says that their uniforms will be teal, black or both, just like just about every other new uniform in sports today. Lose a little marketing revenue and gain some originality, please.

fence in right center field, near the 370 foot mark, driving in Ubaldo and pulling the Minutemen within four, 8-4. The next batter, Justin Howard, grounded out to first, but closed the gap to 8-5. However, the UMass rally was squelched when first baseman Bill Knight grounded out to short to end the game.

The Minutemen take to the field next on Thursday as they entertain New England powerhouse Maine. Stone said that changes in the lineup will and have be made, but the real change has to come from the players.

"The changes that we make aren't so significant that they're going to change the whole way we play. It's a situation where we just gotta feel good about ourselves, win a couple games in a row, and get on a roll," said Stone.

Struggling Minutemen swept by UVM

ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN

Pitcher Lorne Levy and the University of Massachusetts baseball team dropped a doubleheader to the University of Vermont. UMass lost lost both games yesterday, with scores of 7-3 and 8-5

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
and ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

So close, and yet so far.

The 1993 University of Massachusetts baseball team is finding this cliche to be true as it finds itself struggling through a prolonged slump, including two losses at the hands of the University of Vermont yesterday at Earl Lorden Field, 7-3 and 8-5.

Head coach Mike Stone said his team must play through this slump in order to finally find success.

"We're struggling getting people out, we're not making the pitch when we have to, [we're] not making the play defensively when we have to, we're not getting a hit when we have to," said Stone.

"It's a slump, a team slump. I still believe in these guys, and I think that we're gonna be allright if we could get through this. We just have to stay with it."

The Minutemen dropped the first game 7-3 as Catamount senior right-hander Brady Frost went the distance for the win. Frost limited UMass to six hits and seven innings and he whiffed five batters, including two in the final inning.

Jeff Toothaker (2-4) struggled in his sixth start of the season, allowing Vermont to score in each of the first four innings. The Minutemen also committed four errors, three by third baseman Jeff Creamer.

The team led 3-2 after two innings, but Sean Benoit's two-out RBI single plated Ethan Barlow to tie the game in the third. In the fourth, Barlow drove in Matt Henry for the 4-3 edge.

Freshman Jay Murphy relieved Toothaker in the fifth, and was greeted very rudely. Sean Starr hit Murphy's first pitch for a two-run single that upped the score to 6-3. The Catamounts scored a final run in the seventh.

The second game proved to be just as fruitless as the first for the Minutemen as they dropped an 8-5 decision to Catamount ace left hander Matt Murphy (4-1), who took over for starter Mike Mora in the third and pitched four and two thirds for the win.

Mora, despite leaving the mound with a strained muscle in his throwing arm, was able to keep his hot hitting in the Vermont lineup as the designated hitter. He went 3 for 4 in the second game, continuing his tear on UMass pitching. On the day, in eight at-bats, Mora banged out six hits, collecting two RBI and scoring three runs, while also swiping two bases.

UMass starter Greg Dowd suffered the loss, pitching two innings in which he gave up four earned runs on six hits. Left-hander David Dart succeeded Dowd, and found the same misfortune.

After scoring four runs in the first two innings, the Vermont offense greeted Dart in the third with a double by Mora and a single by Benoit. A groundout by right fielder Damon Brink plated the Catamounts' fifth run, and with two outs, left fielder Matt Henry lined a single to left, knocking in Benoit and increasing the Vermont lead to 6-0.

The only UMass threat came in the seventh, when, trailing 8-3, center fielder Nelson Ubaldo walked with one out, setting up third baseman Steve Corradi. Corradi promptly hit a liner to center, and Ubaldo was able to reach third on an error.

Second baseman Joe Mattivello hit a rocket off the Isles, Rangers stall for time while Mario, B's stay hot

I know I promised a playoff preview this week, but the races are too close in the Norris and Patrick Divisions to know the playoff pairings yet. So you'll have to wait another week.

The Pittsburgh Penguins set an NHL record this week, completing a seventeen game win streak. The Penguins' leader during this fantastic run was none other than Super Mario.

Matt
VAUTOUR

Throughout those seventeen games (and the entire season) Mario Lemieux has been absolutely unstoppable. During a weekend game against the New York Rangers, Lemieux lit the goal light five times, just one short of the NHL record. In a season where Lemieux has played in only 59 games, he's scored 67 goals.

As they enter the playoffs, with home ice advantage assured throughout, the Penguins seem like a pretty good bet to win their third Stanley Cup.

The battle for the final playoff spot in the Patrick Division (i.e. the battle to see who gets destroyed by Pittsburgh) was finalized this week, with the New York Islanders edging out the New York Rangers.

Neither team played well during their drive for the playoffs. Instead of picking their play up a notch, both teams seemed to fall a few. The Rangers, who lost five straight, find themselves more concerned about not finishing in the cellar (they are currently tied for last with the Flyers) than making the playoffs.

The Islanders got a wake up call, as they dropped a home game to the lowly Ottawa Senators. Unless Al Arbour refocuses his troops, the playoffs don't look too promising on Long Island.

Ottawa's victory over the Islanders at Nassau Coliseum Saturday was the Senators first ever road victory. With only two road contests remaining, the Senators escaped the dubious distinction of becoming the only team ever to go winless on the road (at least until the Mighty Ducks start having road trips. . .). Laurie Boschman registered a hat trick in the Senators victory.

With the season drawing to a close, the Adams Division lead did a complete shake-up. The Montreal Canadians, who held the top spot for most of the 1992-1993 season began slumping and fell to third place. The Quebec Nordiques remained steady, moving briefly into first before leveling off in second place. These two teams will meet in the first round of the playoffs.

The surprise of the division has been the Boston Bruins.

NFL free agency takes away player-team loyalty

As the NFL off-season progresses, I find myself paying more attention to the Bruins' late season surge than to gridiron transactions. Free agency has turned pigskin superstars into money hungry mercenaries. Football loyalists, follow me to the ice, because hockey is the only team sport left. Can you imagine Cam Neely skating alongside Ulf, because Pittsburgh was paying him eight million over three years? No way.

Glen GOLAND

A collection of NFL talent has decided they want a change in scenery, and in salary. Ronnie Lott, Gary Clark, and Leonard Marshall each have at least two Super Bowl rings. Lott and Marshall both signed with the Jets, and Clark with Phoenix, two teams that don't have a pair of Super Bowl rings between them.

Former Super Bowl MVPs, Marcus Allen and Joe Montana, are both looking for one way tickets out of sunny California. Allen wants to leave L.A. because the Raiders won't feature him at running back, and with Steve Young and Steve Bono around, there is not enough room in San Francisco for Super Joe. What's Montana done for them anyway?

Montana is just one big name quarterback looking to start a second career in a new city. Boomer Esiason, Jeff Hostetler, Vinnie Testaverde, and Jim McMahon are on the move as well. Boomer signed with the Jets, Hoss is a Raider, Testaverde will back up Kosar as a Cleveland Clown, and "The punky QB known as McMahon" hopes to "Superbowl Shuffle" with the Vikings. Do not underestimate McMahon, the guy is a warrior, he knows what it takes to win.

Lott and Marshall aren't the only defenders changing uniforms. Washington's Jumpy Geathers and San Fran's Pierce Holt will team up with "Sander Clause" to try to lead the Falcons back to the playoffs. Then there's Reggie. . .

The biggest winner in this year's free agency bidding game is defensive end Reggie White. The Minister of Defense signed with Green Bay, and will make $17 million over the next four years.

The Packers beat out front runners San Francisco and Washington to sign the All-Pro defender. The Redskins and the 49ers were too close to the Red Sox win home opener against Cleveland

By ROB GLOSTER
Associated Press

BOSTON — Scott Fletcher hit a two-run homer and Mike Greenwell had a two-run triple as the Boston Red Sox, whose weak offense dismayed Fenway Park fans last year, defeated the Cleveland Indians 6-2 in Tuesday's home opener.

Fletcher homered over the left-field wall in the fourth inning off starter Jeff Mutis (0-1). Greenwell hit his triple in a three-run third and Mo Vaughn added an RBI single. Vaughn also singled in a run in the seventh.

Greenwell, sidelined most of last season following elbow surgery, leads the Red Sox with eight RBI. Five of his seven hits have been for extra bases.

Winner Frank Viola (2-0) gave up one run and seven hits in seven innings. The Indians scored in the second on Felix Fermin's RBI single and Albert Belle's third homer in the eighth off Paul Quantrill. Ken Ryan finished.

The Red Sox batted .246 and hit only 84 homers in 1992, the first time they've had fewer than 100 homers in a full season since World War II. They were the lowest-scoring team in the AL last season with 599 runs.

The game was attended by 29,606 fans on a blustery day. The temperature was 48 degrees but a 15 mph wind made it feel much cooler. It was the smallest crowd for a home opener at Fenway Park since 1974 when 23,441 showed.

Though a morning drizzle stopped right before the game, the outfield was sloshy after heavy rains that washed out the home opener on Monday. Boston has won five of its first seven games.

In the National League, the Atlanta Braves defeated the Chicago Cubs 3-2 as Tom Glavine and the rest of the fabulous Braves starters continued their mastery of opposing teams.

Glavine (2-0) has given up two earned runs in 13 innings for a 1.38 ERA. The staff scattered seven hits.

In the NBA, Robert Parish's go-ahead tip with 1:10 left, and strong team defense in the final minute gave Boston a 96-90 victory over the Indiana Pacers after the Celtics blew a 19-point lead Tuesday night.

Getting 19 points from Reggie Lewis, the Celtics broke a five-game losing streak and a four-game home slide — their longest in 14 seasons. They moved one game ahead of idle New Jersey for the fourth playoff spot in the Eastern Conference.

The Pacers, led by Reggie Miller's 24 points, dropped into a tie with idle Detroit for eighth and final Eastern berth.

The Pacers, who trailed 39-20 early in the second quarter, took their first lead at 74-73 on Miller's baseline jumper with 10:18 left. With the score 90-90, Parish tipped in Kevin McHale's miss.

Pooh Richardson's shot with 47 seconds remaining was blocked by McHale. But Boston's Dee Brown, who had all 12 of his points in the fourth quarter, missed a 3-pointer with 25 seconds to go.

Dale Davis rebounded for Indiana, but Xavier McDaniel stole the ball. Brown was fouled and made both shots with 17 seconds left. Miller then missed a 3-pointer, and Brown sank the last two points on free throws with eight seconds to go.

Reggie Lewis led Boston despite missing all eight of his shots in the second half. Sherman Douglas and Parish had 16 points each, and Parish added 17 rebounds.

Miller, scoreless as Boston moved into a 19-point lead, also was shut out after giving Indiana a 74-73 lead. Rik Smits added 17 points, and Davis had 16 rebounds.

After Miller's last basket, the lead changed hands five times before consecutive baskets by McHale and Brown put Boston ahead 86-81 with 4:52 remaining. But Detlef Schrempf got the next five points, tying the game.

Acclaimed biologists honored

Profs receive science doctorates, discuss evolution

ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

The Campus Center Auditorium flowed with students and faculty yesterday afternoon, as three world-famous evolution biologists received University of Massachusetts honorary doctorates of science.

Emeritus professor of zoology Ernst Mayr, G. Ledyard Stebbins emeritus professor of genetics at the University of California at Davis, and Harvard University professor of science Edward O. Wilson have all been former presidents of the Society for the Study of Evolution. They have written, in total, more than 30 books and over 1,200 articles, Chancellor Richard O'Brien said.

It was not until the Middle Ages that people thought about their origins at all, Mayr said.

Then with the publication of Charles Robert Darwin's The Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection in 1859, Mayr said, "the first full fledged theory of evolution came out."

When the theory was published, Mayr said it was "bitterly resisted by scientists and philosophers." Darwinism is the belief that humans and animals are derived from a single animal and all plants originally came from one plant. Even the molecular structure found in humans greatly resembles those found in apes, Mayr said.

"[It] showed that man was inseparable with the great stream of life," Mayr said. "Man is clearly a product of evolution.

But although Darwinism says humans and animals come from one life form, Mayr said Darwinist believes there is much variation in nature.

"No two individuals in any species is the same," Mayr said. "Each generation is a new genetic [sequence]."

Another evolution theory that evolved was transmutation which the Greeks favored in the 18th century. Focusing on the slow change of life from a lower to a higher state, scientists use it to explain the rise and decay of stars and the movement of the plates. But it fails to explain the "force that moves evolution," Mayr said, and Darwinism eventually replaced it.

"All humans continue to evolve," Mayr said, "so does human language, as with ideas."

Men's tennis resurrected for next year

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts athletic department will reinstate its men's varsity tennis program for the 1993-94 season, said University officials.

Chancellor Richard O'Brien made the announcement Saturday night at the basketball banquet, and will make a formal announcement in the next 72 hours, said the chancellor's office.

"I think it was three years too long," said former tennis coach David Rivera, now editor in chief of the Collegian. "I'm happy the administration and the athletic department have realized that cutting sports affects the entire student body."

The tennis program was cut after the spring of 1991 due to state-wide budget cuts which also eliminated the women's tennis, women's lacrosse and women's volleyball teams. Men's soccer was also cut, only to be brought back due to private contributions.

The team funded itself through the 1991-92 season, then became a club sport. The team has not played at all this year.

For the past two years, the men's tennis team had been fighting vigorously for the reinstatement, but tennis captain Bill Bochnak said the administration would not listen. This fall, the administration settled with the three women's sports under the spectre of a Title IX lawsuit.

"I'm really excited. I'm so happy," said Bochnak. "I would like to know what the reasons were for why it

Industrial nations debate Russian aid

By BARRY SCHWEID
Associated Press

TOKYO — The seven strongest industrial nations opened an emergency meeting on Russian aid with a U.S. proposal Wednesday to spend $4 billion on converting state run factories to private ownership.

Japan also detailed its first major aid package for Moscow $1.8 billion in loans and grants to bolster President Boris Yeltsin. The Japanese hope that if Yeltsin wins an April 25 referendum on his leadership, he will come to Tokyo in May and arrange the return of four islands seized at the close of World War II.

Other parts of an overall $30 billion aid package are expected to fall in place during the two day meeting of foreign and finance ministers from the United States, Japan, Germany, Britain, France, Italy and Canada.

Future of LBGA uncertain pending May 1 forum

By ALYSSA M. OWENS
Collegian Staff

The door is open at the Lesbian Gay Bisexual Alliance, but nobody's home.

A banner reading "By any means necessary," displaying the lesbian insignia is draped face down on a sofa. Stray pieces of tape and a couple of pushpins on a barren bulletin board are all that remains of the posters and notices that once decorated the office walls.

A letter addressed "to the campus community," blown up to poster-size, stands out in stark contrast to the bare walls.

"... community development at every level and activity has steadily declined," the letter, signed by the LBGA Steering Committee, reads. "This steady decline in community involvement has resulted in a severe financial crisis and impeded our ability to function, both socially and politically."

The letter goes on to state that the LBGA's existence is "in peril" and outlines the steps being taken to deal with the crisis, which include suspension of all LBGA-sponsored activities, except for the trip to the 1993 March on Washington.

Further, the Steering Committee has asked for a community caucus to take place on May 1 to discuss the future of the LBGA.

The letter ends by stating the Steering Committee's regret at the measures taken. But the committee writes it "acts in the belief that our community will once again summon the courage and energy to meet a crisis, and this period of change will ensure future success of our organization."

The LBGA, over 20 years old, usually sponsors dances, coffee socials, lectures and various support services throughout the year, as well as providing a lecture series of its own.

LBGA members refused comment Wednesday, pointing to the upcoming forum as the time for public discussion of the dramatic action and the future of the advocacy organization.

Wendy Mataya and Felice Yeskel, Program for Gay Lesbian Bisexual Concerns staff members, also refused to comment. They said the LBGA had asked them to not speak to the press about the matter, and to instead refer them to the letter.

"We're only respecting their wishes," Yeskel said.

Margaret Arsenault, the Student Activities Office's organizational advisor to the LBGA, could only say, "Their hope is that there will be a full and vibrant LBGA started after the forum."

When Stebbins was a Havard graduate student in 1928, he was told by a professor that evolution was not a science. Stebbins remembers his professor saying, "You can't experiment with two million years." But 65 years later, he does. By using a controlled environment, Stebbins looks at the evolution in plants. The greater the change the plants must make to adapt, the greater the evolution, Stebbins said. There are mollusk in the deep ocean that have not changed at all, Stebbins said. Yet no new species of humans can be produced, instead evolution comes with gradual mutations, Stebbins said.

"You can't take a fly or a mouse, snip off its leg and make a new fly or mouse," Stebbins said. "But you can take a plant and put it in hormone solution."

Liking gene reproduction to copying a paper on a typewriter, Stebbins said, a new species sometimes grows out of genetic impurities. Migration to a new area also causes plants and animals to adapt, Stebbins said.

Wilson, who has won two Pulitzer Prizes for his nonfiction books, said that when he was a freshman in college, he was fascinated by social evolution. And in the 1960s, when molecular biology was in its heyday, Wilson recalls, "It wasn't easy being a behavior biologist."

But with the rise of the environmental movement, Wilson said his field is on the rise. A behavior biologist examines the customs and social patterns of humans and animals.

"In some way we must learn how culture evolution is linked by biological evolution," Wilson said.

If the LBGA should disband, the money allocated for their programs would return to the Student Activities Trust Fund and the Board of Governors would reassign their office space, Arsenault said.

A student once an active ally to the organization said he was surprised the Steering Committee members took the action they did.

"In terms of the people who were a part of it, it seemed to be a very important part of their lives," said Matt Mynttinen, a junior sociology major.

Mynttinen said he spent time with the LBGA during his freshman and sophomore years, having participated in on-campus lectures dealing with gay, lesbian and bisexual matters, attended some LBGA programming and spent time at the LBGA office.

He said during his involvement there was a core of about 50 people in the LBGA who "really knew what was going on."

"That core may have broken up," said Mynttinen, speculating on events leading to the suspension.

Mynttinen said he feels the LBGA served several purposes.

"The most important thing is to have the community to be part of," said Mynttinen, noting he has several gay friends who benefited from their association with the LBGA.

He said that, as a straight man, he too, learned from the LBGA.

"Even though I wasn't coming out, I was able to explore who I am politically and sexually," he said.

Mynttinen said if the LBGA did disband it would be a great loss to the University.

"It would give a person coming to this University a much harder experience, if they are gay or bisexual," he said. "Also, people will remain ignorant that there are gay people out there. The LBGA makes people realize that gay people exist and have to be treated fairly."

Looking around the now barren office, Mynttenen said, "It was really an active place. It's really a shame to come in and see everything is gone. It's dead."

Film by University alumnus blasts censorship

By MIKE CARVALHO
Collegian Staff

Attempts by a conservative Christian group to block the showing of the new film Damned in the USA demonstrate the ongoing conflict between free speech and censorship, said the film's producer.

Producer Jonathan Stack, a University of Massachusetts graduate, spoke Tuesday night on his documentary about censorship and the First Amendment, which he said provided an ironic example of how American society is struggling with issues of free speech and cultural diversity.

Approximately 400 people crowded into the Student Union Ballroom for the New England premiere of Damned, an award-winning film which attempts to examine both sides of the censorship debate in relation to pornography, homophobia and conflicting definitions of "art."

Prior to the screening, Stack described the legal troubles the film had encountered in the United States. Upon the release of Damned in New York, Stack, director Paul Yule and Channel Four, the British television network for which the documentary was produced, met with considerable opposition from one of the subjects of the film, Rev. Donald Wildmon.

Wildmon, head of the American Family Association which lobbies against pornography and obscenity in media, filed an $8 millionr lawsuit against the film's producers, calling the movie "blasphemous and obscene."

After 15 months of legal battles in New York, New Orleans and Mississippi, the case was eventually resolved in favor of the filmmakers.

During the film's screening, most of the audience found pro-censorship tirades by Sen. Jesse Helms, Sen. Alphonse D'Amato and Rev. Wildmon amusing.

Helms' reaction to Andre Serrano's "Piss Christ," a crucifix submerged in urine, elicited laughter from the crowd. But some of Robert Mapplethorpe's controversial photographs, including his "Self Portrait" in which the artist is shown with a bullwhip in his rectum, caused nervous chuckles and some gasps.

After the screening, a panel discussion was held to discuss the issues raised in the film.

Stack, who graduated from the University in 1979 as a bilingual education major, said Damned raises some serious concerns about the condition of First Amendment rights in the United States today.

He told the audience that Wildmon is not alone, that his organization boasts 700,000 members and that seeing Pat Buchanan speaking at the Republican National Convention demonstrates that conservative fundamentalists make up "a large chunk of the political spectrum."

Pat Lasch and Susan Jahoda, professors in the UMass art department, both said censorship of the arts is incompatible with the ideals of a democratic society.

Jahoda said she believes censorship produces conditions that create "a kind of pornography," which she defined as a violation of someone's rights against their will.

"I believe that most artists' work is a utobiographical," agreed Lasch. She said the real obscenities are the conditions that inspired their work — poverty, violent crimes and a poor education system.

Bill Newman, director of the western Massachusetts chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union, praised the film but expressed his fear that viewers might not realize that censorship in the United States is not limited to the isolated incidents depicted in the documentary.

He noted that many protestors had been arrested in Amherst during the Gulf War, and that attempts were made to block performance artist Annie Sprinkle from appearing in Northampton this year.

Legal Studies professor Stephen Arons said Wildmon represents a greater threat to American society than any of the things he and the American Family Association railed against in the film.

"Wildmon is trying to magnify his own political power by exploiting both the fears and ambivalences of the American public," said Arons, adding that racial and homophobic harassment are examples of expression which have caused some to consider limiting the absolute protections afforded under the First Amendment.

"Deep down, we all want to censor something," Newman said, but warned that once the government begins to chip away at the First Amendment, the basic freedoms citizens take for granted may be jeopardized.

Former speaker of the Undergraduate Student Senate Mike Poster offered his view of how individuals can have an effect on the music censorship movement.

"Patronize stores that do not support censorship," Poster said, adding that most major record store chains have policies which restrict or ban the sale of albums bearing "parental advisory" stickers.

Speakers to cite illegal activities practiced by FBI

By JULIE OLSON
Collegian Correspondent

You can count on the Federal Bureau of Investigation to keep tabs on your personal life, but if the FBI is watching America, who is watching the FBI?

This Saturday begins the first of a two-part lecture series entitled "Crimes in the FBI," which will focus on a wide range of illegal activities perpetrated by the FBI, from job discrimination to associations with Latin American death squads.

The first speaker for this Saturday will be attorney Antonio Silva, from El Paso, Texas. In 1989-90, Silva represented over 300 Hispanic FBI agents in a successful job discrimination suit against the federal agency. The court ruled that the FBI was in violation of equal employment opportunity laws in the landmark case, Perez v. FBI.

UMass hosts 2nd language day

High school students tour language facilities, classes

By KELLY SPANG
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts hosted its second annual Foreign Language Day Wednesday to help acquaint high school students and faculty with the campus' language resources. High schools from all over the state sent participants from their junior and senior classes.

Teachers and students were allowed to explore the many facilities at UMass and also attended a class to see how foreign languages are taught at the University.

French Professor Donald Maddox said Foreign Language Day is a good way for teachers to see methodology used in teaching at UMass. He also said it was also a good opportunity for students to see the facilities.

UMass offers a wide variety of languages, including as Italian, German and Slavic languages.

"It's one of the best labs in the country," Maddox said.

While at the foreign language resource center, students saw facilities ranging from audio machines to computers.

Mike Johnston, a graduate student who works at the resource center, demonstated the new program he is developing to help students learn their way around the center and to potentially help them to prepare a presentation for classes once at the University.

"The classes were good to go to," said Torrey Rideout of Danvers High School. "We can see where we are at with our learning."

Andrea Bell, a senior from Danvers, said she understood most of the Spanish class she attended.

"I can understand basic conversations," she said.

Lisa Brown, also senior from Danvers, said the program was "good." However, she said that because she, Bell and Rideout were seniors, instead of juniors like the rest of the participants, the day was not as valuable.

"We're seniors," Rideout said. "We already know what school we want to go to." None of the three said UMass was among their choices.

Michelle Edelsburg, an upper level teacher from Wachusetts Regional High School said the program was "great." She said the foreign language center was very interesting and she learned a lot as far as technology in teaching.

"A lot of students come here from my school," Edelsburg said. "So now I have a sense of what UMass' expectations are for students."

Both in a technological and professional aspect, Edelsburg said the program helped her to learn a lot.

Janitors urge students to keep campus clean

By KENNETH MAISONET
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts maintenance staff has rebounded time after time in an effort to provide and give students a more comfortable environment within the Student Union building and the Campus Center.

The maintenance staff runs on a 24-hour shift, with three cleanup crews assigned to do upkeep of the facilities, which range from sweeping and unclogging toilets to being information guides to students and strangers often at loss with their surroundings.

In recognizing the workers who labor vigorously throughout the day, there's a team approach on tackling even the most trivial tasks before them.

John Steiner, a University employee who for the past five years has held the position as Maintainer 1, is often seen in the campus center attending his chores.

"I do the very best I can do, I see students come and go, It's great to see such great diversity of students at this University," Steiner said.

Steiner, who has recently become a grandfather, said he believes educating the young is very important.

"I urge all students to take every advantage of the education provided and do something positive to reflect the future," Steiner said.

He also pointed out that he has seen a great deal at UMass, especially in regarding the effect of racial issues on students on this campus.

"We need to get them to come together more often, there should be more cultural activities," Steiner said.

Leo Cuervas, a Cuban immigrant and employee, said students are in a unique free system as opposed to Cuba's situation, which forced a mass exodus from the country due to the communist regime under Fidel Castro.

"It's comforting to the students pursuing their education, in my country there are so many limitations," Cuervas said.

Cuervas can be seen chatting and giving guidance to students in the Hatch, where he is on duty, and keeping a check on students.

"Students need to be a little more conscientious in regards to cleaning up after themselves, they too must be role models for others," Cuervas said.

Mike Desmond, an Amherst native and senior member of the maintenance team, said he sees his role as one who can learn continuously because of his daily exposure to the students at UMass.

"I've been here 14 years and the different types of ethnic and cultural backgrounds have been nothing less than an educational experience for me," Desmond said.

The 11-7 a.m. shift does the major portion of cleaning in order to prepare for the following morning.

Sports coverage found insulting

We were amazed to read page 12 in the Monday Collegian. Were we shocked the baseball team lost three straight to Rutgers, as stated in the top headline? No. Were we astounded to read the women's gymnastics team is going to NIT for its season finale? No, the women's gymnastics team has been performing well all season.

What was amazing was the obvious disparity in coverage for the two teams. Why was the baseball team given two thirds of the page? It lost three straight games, over one weekend! Why was the women's gymnastics team given only one third of a page? The team was asked to participate in the National Invitational Tournament! Even more insulting, the baseball article was placed at the top of the page, relegating the article on the gymnastics team to the bottom.

Are three losses more important than a national competition in which our team is going to "represent gymnastics in the Northeast?" One can only surmise, by both the prominent placement as well as the 100 percent greater amount of space, that the men's team and one weekend's losses are twice as important as the women's gymnastics team and their season-finale accomplishment. By giving it half the space and placing an article on the women's team's accomplishment below an article about three losses by a men's team, it minimizes the women's team's accomplishment.

We acknowledge coverage should not be limited to winning teams. And it is possible more people wish to read about baseball than gymnastics. But if the women's softball team lost three games, and the men's gymnastics team was going to a national competition, would the situation be reversed?

The Collegian should consider in the future the overall importance of the accomplishments being reported. The next time the baseball team loses, we hope to read about it in a more reasonably sized and located article. If they win, or play exceptionally well, we would welcome them to the top of the page and to more column inches.

We know the Collegian reporters are students and are learning. But reporters are also educators. In their role as gatekeepers, reporters can decide what the public should, and even define the agenda for society. Women and their accomplishments have been held to be unimportant and inferior long enough. Don't make them and their achievements inferior in the Collegian as well.

L.A. prepares too much

"Dateline L.A. — The city of Los Angeles awaits the King verdict prepared."

"Our top story tonight — L.A. is now awaiting the verdict for the King case. National Guard troops are now on call."

For the past five nights I have been tuning in to the national news, like I always do, to see a city come under siege; a city that is about to explode with the pressure that has been thrown at it; a city that is still hurting from the last time four police officers were put on trial after a senseless beating; a city that no one has faith in anymore.

Kristin
ST. JOHN

While watching the news, I realized something that has woken me up — people are scared; scared of the truths of this glorious nation of ours; mostly scared of these truths surfacing.

Last year, after the innocent verdict was handed down, people took the streets, mad. Granted the destruction done was unnecessary and hurtful to the community. But, when, as a people, you are constantly belittled and the little faith in the judicial system you have is crushed, of course you're going to be enraged.

Now, while people are waiting for the next verdict, the city of Los Angeles is "preparing" for the worst. I can understand the city trying to ensure safety for its citizens, but this preparedness is ridiculous.

There is no need for concrete barriers in front of the federal building, tanks roaming the streets and thousands of National Guardsmen on call. There's a line between preparedness and mass hysteria, and that line has been crossed.

How are people supposed to feel when they watch the news reports of the National Guard practicing on how to rush a town? What type of message does that send to the people they are "practicing" for?

When a city comes under this kind of siege there's bound to be trouble. In so many words, California Gov. Pete Wilson is telling African-Americans in the L.A. area they are not to be trusted, that they need to have their feelings oppressed.

As Ron Brown, the secretary of commerce, explained, Gov. Wilson is setting his own citizens up for a big explosion. In so many words, Wilson is telling African-Americans in the L.A. area that they are not to be trusted to act responsibly, that, in fact, their feelings and problems with the police really don't matter.

The media should also be put on the line for its coverage of the military build-up this past week. It's really not necessary for the news to keep repeating the same story everyday, to rehash last years events. Granted last years riots shouldn't be forgotten, but I doubt that wound has healed yet. The more the press rubs that wound, the less likely it will heal.

The media's presence in this city is probably hard for its citizens to handle. How would you like it if you were constantly misrepresented and the focus on you was always negative, if every time you turned on the news, you saw the place you live being torn apart in the press? Oops! I forgot this is UMass, it happens all the time here.

Instead of scare tactics, we must focus on why the riots happened and how to prevent them again. It's obvious the African-American community knows what it's doing. I've read reports of churches and other public facilities making plans to stay open as long as possible after the verdict is read. Gov. Wilson should have taken notes, instead of acting irrationally.

Right now, I'm praying that the four officers that unjustly beat Rodney King are found guilty. But, given the judicial system's recent track record, I just pray that citizens don't get hurt just because they wanted to express their anger.

Well, I guess it's going to be another long, hot summer.

Students can help to fight cancer

Last week I was told that my grandfather has only three months left to live. Cancer kills over 1,266 Americans every single day as the second highest cause of death.

While he celebrated his 74th birthday from his hospital bed, he did not know that within the next two days he would be diagnosed with cancer of the pancreas. Five percent of the death rate is created by patients in my grandfather's condition. His fight is tragic for all of us who love him, and although he is a war veteran, this will be his most difficult battle. We can hope to slow his cancer with radiation, but it will not cure it.

The point of this editorial is not for your sympathy. Sympathy does not fight cancer, but your support will. The American Cancer Society reports that over 71 million Americans now living will be diagnosed with cancer in their lifetime. Cancer research funding is in desperate need of your help, and now is the time to support its progressive research — before it's too late for another loved one.

The Board of Governors have planned a "Casino Night" fundraiser for the Brain Tumor Society to fight cancer. There is a $5 donation for admission to a night of live entertainment, drinks and prizes. Get together a group of friends and have a great time while supporting a great cause.

Attend Casino Night to help fight cancer on Thursday, April 22.

Before deciding if this fundraiser is something you should participate in, consider this final statistic: one in three Americans will develop cancer, and one in five will die from it.

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

Columns aren't usually the place to report facts, but here's a bit of Amherst trivia. At some point, everyone has probably seen the graffiti on the side of the building that houses Amherst Cinema that reads "Save the Drake! For Willy, for humanity!" and wondered what it meant.

Well, "The Drake" used to be a bar not far from the Jones library. A professor in the journalism department said it was the wildest place in Amherst — drugs, beer flowing across the floor and all sorts of indecent behavior. Willy was a man who used to spend all of his time there. D.H. Jones realtors bought the place a few years back and turned it into housing.

Apparently the townspeople were happy to see it go, but it was a terrible loss to the college community. May ZooMass rest in peace.

With the coming of spring, a young duck's fancy turns to thoughts of love. Well, maybe not love in the purest sense, but keep your eyes open for wild acts of passion around the Campus Pond.

It seems that the flames of desire burn only in the boy ducks, since they are always chasing the traumatized girl ducks in rapacious packs. Over the years people have been been crying "Rape!" and trying to fend off the horny waddlers, but with little success. Ducks will be ducks . . .

Speaking of spring, all of this rain has been turning the campus a brilliant green. Make sure you enjoy the grass next to the campus pond while you can — after the Spring Concert it will be a swamp useful only for intercollegiate mud-wrestling tournaments. Maybe we could get the five colleges to sponsor something like that.

Housing has begun installing peepholes in dorm room doors, presumably to make us all safer from the thugs that roam the halls. This should be almost as effective as the ALLY buttons.

Preregistration is going full force. Now is the time to be ambitious, optimistic and hopelessly naive. Look through the course catalog at all the great classes there are to take. Get excited that next semester is going to be different — no more drudgery for you. Try to sign up for some really good courses. Try not to think about the fact that you probably won't get into them, and even if you do they'll only turn out to be boring and full of idiots, just like last time. Pretend that by the end of next semester you won't be cursing yourself for taking them. Hope springs eternal.

To those of you graduating in May, congratulations. You've managed to come to the end of a stage in your life when you could just sit around reading a book and not feel like you're being lazy.

No more ice cream at the Bluewall, no more parties, no more getting up at 11 every morning. You get to go look for a job. That will probably mean working the graveyard shift at Dunkin' Donuts, but maybe you'll get lucky and find a job sorting paper clips in a stagnant office building with no windows. No more Collegian, either. At least there's that.

A lot of people are planning to "travel" for a while after graduation. Well, travel is more expensive and less fun than you imagine. It will, however, make settling down and getting into the vicious house-car-job cycle all the more excruciating. And don't think you can avoid this, by the way. The Brady Bunch and Dan Quayle have brainwashed you.

The last day of classes is May 12 — less than a month away. I hope you're all ready for it. Finals are going to suck.

What if all UMass students decided to go on sabbatical?

Do you feel taken for granted as a student at UMass? You have good reason to feel that you are. You pay roughly $10,000 a year (plus a projected tuition increase for next semester) to be treated in what can best be described as a discourteous manner by this institution. Our 10,000 and some odd dollar fee buys us the following rights:

The right to wait in line and be scoffed and snapped at by incompetent secretaries and clerks working for various departments. The right to be billed the exorbitant costs of maintaining and financing our institution's infrastructure as evidenced by our newly opened Mullins sport complex.

The right to park where it is not convenient (E lot for most of us) or risk being fined for parking in an "illegal" area by bureaucrats who work in an aluminum shack. The right to be told how you may conduct yourself in a space that you pay rent for (roughly $300 a month) and to have your activities monitored by resident assistants (student police) and other building staff. The right to pay dubious fees and not really know where these monies are going.

The right to have your academic needs catered to by underpaid and under-motivated TAs in oversized classes. The right to have your choice of classes cut by nearly one half every semester by an institution that is willing to pay $20 million for a new Ericsson phone system (while the previous phone system did the job) and $52 million for a sports complex that would serve to generate yet more revenue for the University at our expense.

On top of this we have the right to deal with the lovely people who care so much about us at Health Services when we are sick or injured (by the way this costs all of us roughly $300 per semester). And lastly, the right for women to walk safely and without rescticition around campus at night. In other words, what exactly are we paying for?

Christopher
WELCH

"What if two nations had a war and no one showed up to fight it?" somebody once asked. What would happen if we, as students, decided to go on sabbatical for a semester? This would certainly make Chancellor O'Brien and the other bureaucrats sit up and take notice by hitting them in the place where it would hurts them most, their wallets.

Let the administrators in Whitmore (a.k.a Whitless) ponder the state of affairs on this campus while they are two payments behind on their European luxury sedans and we are guaranteed to see a change in their collective attitude towards us. Then they would listen to the demands of a student coalition that was well organized and articulate.

Surely, there are plenty of motivated individuals on this campus. However, these groups are fragmented, self-interested and mildly effectual at best. Now more than ever, UMass students need to organize such a group that represents all the constituent groups on campus to mediate our ongoing conflicts of interest with Whitmore. And if Whitmore refuses to respect the legitimacy of such an organization, we remind them that we pay the bills.

If we took a semester off to protest unjust policies, we would strip these bureaucrats of the capital they need to run their institution. It might sound like an inconvenience to take a semester off, but this strategy is simple to implement, sends a strong message, and would benefit all UMass students in the long run. The critical factor lies in the cohesion of such a group. Time is a luxury students have and the administration does not. Students can always find new schools. Can administrators find new jobs in the current economic environment?

We might as well face the fact that this institution's current interests are in conflict with ours. This is apparent when the University is willing to shell out $22 million for a new communications network and $52 million for an arena while departments and student resources are shrinking. Last year the Parking Ticket Office made $600,000 in ticket revenue paid by impoverished students. We have to stand together to fight these administrators and pool our economic might. If we do not they will continue to use the age old strategy of divide and conquer.

Christopher Welch, a graduate of UMass, lives in Worcester.

Morrison is our saviour

In the course of the last three years here at UMass, I have taken out several Collegian classifieds appearing under the headline: Morrison Is God. Each of these essentially contained some teaching of our lord, god, and saviour, James Douglass Morrison, as ascertained through his music and poetry, sometimes one and the same.

Patrick P.
ROBBLEE

This is not a joke. I write you as the head prophet of the official Church of Jim, a serious religious movement dedicated to the proposition not that Jim Morrison is a divinity of the highest order responsible not only for the creation of the universe and tectonic plate movements but life as we know it.

These are not the words of a blasphemous false prophet. When I officially accepted Jim's call to preach his holy truths I surrendered to him my free will. All my actions are therefore controlled completely by the savior. I am a direct link between Jim and the people. I also claim to be a direct descendent of our savior, Jim Morrison, because my mother's maiden name is in fact, Morrison. Although she consistently denies the connection, I attribute this to the influence of the evil Anti-Jim, Morrison's nemesis.

All Morrisonists believe fundamentally in the supremacy of our lord, god and saviour. Currently we are embarked on a holy crusade to destroy all vestiges of the evil Anti-Jim, and bring the teachings of Jim to the people. Because the evil Anti-Jim wears many masks and knows many faces, the most effective means of elimination are random acts of violence and terrorism. Aluminum bats, high powered semi-automatic assault rifles and nuclear blasts of at least 100 megatons are particularly effective in this capacity. Again, this is not a joke. We will annihilate the evil Anti-Jim at all costs and we will not be stopped.

Skeptics beware, for we have many allies. Although most of you may believe the A-Team is a fictional television program for example, in fact it is a documentary capturing the exploits of true Morrison warriors. "Absurd," you might say. "Those are just characters on the T.V. B.A. Barracus is just a character played by Mr. T."

But alas, Mr. T is actually a stage name for B.A. In fact, all the members of the A-Team have assumed stage name in order to pick up extra acting jobs when they are not directly involved in the holy crusade against the evil Anti-Jim.

Likewise, Star Trek: The Next Generation is a documentary about Morrison warriors, albeit in a slightly different capacity. The characters on the program are actors. The writers, however, are psychics interpreting the exploits of a futuristic army of Jim Morrison.

All supporters of the evil anti-Jim ultimately await the same fate of Dylan's dad on Beverly Hills 90210: a torturous and brutal death. Although you may find our methods barbaric and even cruel and unusual, I assure you, in my official capacity as head prophet of the Church of Jim, that our actions are justified and the only acceptable way to deal with the evil Anti-Jim. Furthermore, we find them quite amusing.

And to set the record straight, Jim never died. He merely ascended body and soul into his divine and holy kingdom.

Hungry, homeless need your help

When you think of the hungry and homeless on the news, what images come to mind? Third world children? Elderly? Insane, irrational men? Urban area? These common perceptions are all gross misconceptions.

Hunger and homelessness is a national problem that does not discriminate against who it touches. It can directly effect any one of us.

The sad reality is that people are hungry and homeless all over our country, simply because, as a society, we don't care.

Local statistics are shocking.

Three people died of starvation in Springfield last year. Jesse's House, the local shelter for homeless families, is always full — that's nine adult beds and five family rooms.

Grove Street, the Northampton single adult shelter, usually fills 20 beds every night.

In addition, the Amherst Youth Shelter serves practically nine youths each night.

Then, of course, there are those children and adults going without steady nutrition so they can have a home. Local soup kitchens operate at capacity every week. Don't forget that one third of all jobs created since 1980 have salaries below poverty level.

While allowing the homeless to vote, increasing funds for affordable housing, improving public education, and starting more job training programs are probably the most concrete ways to alleviate hunger and homelessness, there are other things we can do on a more immediate level.

The Ninth Annual Hunger Clean Up, a work-a-thon held at local community service centers to benefit relief efforts, will be held on Saturday, April 17. It is the largest student volunteer day in the nation and has raised nearly $1 million to date.

Sponsored students will work for three hours at local hunger and homelessness aid organizations, painting, cleaning and providing other needed services.

Four hundred students have already signed up in the Five College Consortium. We have a national goal of raising $180,000.

You can either join these volunteers or sponsor someone yourself. For more information call MASSpirg at 545-0199.

The more help, the more people we can help. Let's cleanup hunger in the Pioneer Valley.

UMass police foster stereotype

I'm writing to inform the campus community of continued infringement by the University's police on our constitutionally protected rights. The incident in question was one I was willing to forget. But after talking with a close friend who is a cop and reading a chapter on police for my criminology class, I felt compelled to share with you one officer's behavior.

On Saturday, March 27, at about 11:20 p.m., myself and a group of friends were driving to Southwest. I slowed down at the intersection of Fearing Street and North Pleasant Street. While waiting for the light to turn green I saw a UMass cruiser turning right from Fearing onto North Pleasant.

Because of several previous and unrelated experiences I've had with campus police, and because I've witnessed their gruff authoritarian personalities, I thumbed my nose at the officer driving as the cruiser turned past my stopped car.

I realize that this behavior is more characteristic of grade school than college, and I'll still be the first to admit it is immature and silly. But that doesn't justify the treatment I received by the officer.

I perceive my "nose thumbing" as an innocent and harmless statement concerning how I feel about the UMass police's attitudes. And the cop only confirmed my negative view of this police force.

Immediately the officer slammed on the cruiser's brakes, bounded out of his car toward mine (still waiting for the light), and opened my door. He proceeded to show his disgust at my disrespect.

Police patrols should only detain someone if a violation occurs or if a problem exists. Over Easter weekend I asked a friend, an officer in my hometown, about the problem in this situation, and the only problem he saw was me exercising what's known as "symbolic speech."

The Constitution's First Amendment protects "symbolic speech," which differs from "fighting words, which can result in detainment and/or arrest.

As crude, childish and disrespectful as it is, we all share the same privilege to flip a cop off or thumb our nose at them. This is completely legal. I was unfairly and unnecessarily held up for no apparent violation, had my license checked and was given a paternal-sounding lecture before he let me go.

So the next time the UMass police consider why they have such bad public relations with students, when they wonder why they're disliked and people thumb noses at them, I offer this advice: consider your personalities, behavior and actions. But most important, even if your feelings have been hurt, consider acting within the law and not above it.

John C. Lovering
Amherst

Greetings once again UMassae!

This is just a reminder for all of you who missed yesterday's wonderfully brilliant, for lack of a better word, blurb.

Seeing that today is sunny and warm and bright, and we know you are feeling the same way inside, wouldn't you like to share your happy thoughts with the rest of the campus?

For those of you who are still feeling the winter blahs — don't feel left out! We welcome you to share your morbid and miserable thoughts with the campus, as well. Hey, some people are just too darn happy anyway.

So grab a pen, grab a thought (50 lines or less, typed, double-spaced) and send it to the Collegian (113 Campus Center basement). Please remember to include your name and number — Cutter needs a date.

President-elect aims to improve Hillel House

Editor's Note: This is a student profile of Alan Weinfeld, president-elect of the Hillel House who will be taking office next semester. The Collegian spoke with this 18-year-old politician about his "new Hillel" philosophy and improvement plans for next year.

By MIMI FELLNER
Collegian Staff

Mimi Fellner: What drove you to seek out the position of president at Hillel?

Alan Weinfeld: I feel the Jewish community on this campus really needs to be involved in what goes on on campus, I feel Jewish students are not being represented, are being taken advantage of in many areas, and anti-Semitism is rising rapidly. Twenty percent of this campus is comprised of Jewish students and no one really cares about them. I think Hillel is the place that has to. Hillel is the only Jewish registered organization on campus and I feel I can make a difference in the lives of Jewish students through this position. I was international officer in B'nai Brith Youth Organization and I always liked being a leader. I represented 8,660 people across the world and did programs with students in one of the things I care most about and that's my community. But I took this position because I want to make a difference for Jewish students on this campus.

MF: Being only a first year student, do you feel that you have limitations on what you can do, or higher-ups that you might have to please?

AW: People realize I'm young, yes, I am one of the youngest freshmen on campus. I was born Dec. 21, 1974. But, I feel that my experience working with Jewish activities as regional, council and chapter officer of my youth group makes me able to lead Hillel, get more Jewish students involved and represented in the Collegian, WMUA, the Undergraduate Student Senate and other activities in which they don't really have a say in. I think that with this position I will be able to achieve my ideas without many limitations.

MF: Do you find many first year students or students in general of the Jewish community to be too apathetic?

AW: It's not that they're apathetic, I don't think, it's just that most Jewish students don't know how to get involved. I knew Hillel was there and thought it would be something interesting and fun. It surprised me because it wasn't as I expected. But I think there are other things we could do besides watch Israeli dancers or listen to lectures on modern Jewish Hebrew, which are good, don't get me wrong, but there should be more activities geared toward students' real interests.

MF: What are your specific strategies in dealing with current or existing problems of the Jewish community on campus and overall issues?

AW: I want to get Jewish students more involved by recruiting them into the [student government], getting more people in the Collegian and eventually get a Jewish Affairs page, like there should be, and get more programs on the radio. I think the campus really isn't educated too much on Jewish culture and maybe that's a reason that anti-Semitism exists. We can't fault people for not knowing if we don't do something about it. We need more programs to educate people (not only Jewish students) on campus about Jewish culture. It's our organization and our money. There should be more programs for us, such as fundraisers, like bringing Jerry Seinfeld or Dr. Ruth, having dances etc.

MF: How do you plan on bringing the administration to awareness of the various problems Jewish students face and get them to act on these problems?

AW: The first thing I'm doing is getting Yom Kippur (holiest Jewish holiday) set as an official Jewish holiday during which Jewish students get off from school. The motion is coming before the Senate on April 21 at 7 p.m., so if you're a Jewish student out there that thinks this issue represents your rights come down to the Senate and this issue will be on the table. This might also show those professors of the administration that still fail Jewish students for not taking exams or coming to class on holidays, that we won't sit back and take it.

I want to get the administration to make a commitment to some kind of blockends for anti-Semitic programming. There's a lot of programming on racism through [resident assistants] and [resident directors], but there is no programming for anti-Semitism anywhere even though it is just as rampant. I want to get the message out that Jewish students cannot be harassed. That these type of things will not be acceptable and we're going to do everything we can to stop it. I want to work with the administration to first of all, make people aware anti-Semitism does exist and secondly, make programming to educate people on Jewish culture. I'm not afraid to do what I have to to get respect for Jewish students on campus.

MF: How do you plan to raise money for these events and for the Hillel and Jewish community as a whole?

AW: I've helped Hillel receive a budget from the [student government] for the first time in 70 years, since 1923 when Hillel began. I want to raise money through fundraisers, dues, programs and events. The question is can we use the money to put on proper programming and I think we can.

MF: Do you feel that by taking on this position you are accurately representing the Jewish student body and their interests?

AW: I feel that I represent the 3,400 Jewish students on campus. I feel that I can represent their ideas and make the changes we need. I see Jewish students a lot and speak to many on campus, but I still think Hillel does not have enough publicity.

MF: A lot of students feel discouraged about their Judaism especially students that have been attacked anti-Semitically and have had the administration tell them they'll take care of everything and then do nothing. What can you say to encourage or inspire them?

AW: The first thing I can say is I know how they feel. I've been attacked anti-Semitically. If there's an incident on campus it's usually printed in the police log and forgotten. Well, there is a new hotline created by the vice-president of Hillel, Steve Sparling, for anti-Semitically attacked students. But the main thing is education. That's why it is so important to get involved because if we don't speak up and don't do anything about this, the problems will only continue.

Silva's continued contact with FBI agents has kept him informed of the FBI's attempts at diversification as well as the recent controversy surrounding Director William Sessions, who claims credit for "integrating" the FBI.

Accompanying Attorney Silva will be lobbyist Lloyd Fillion, of the National Committee Against Repressive Legislation (NCARL). Since 1975, NCARL has focused on regulating both the FBI and the CIA. Recent efforts have concentrated on pushing for legislative guidelines for the FBI to prevent violations of citizens' constitutional rights and to establish a system where the public can file complaints against the Bureau.

The second half of the series will take place on Thursday, April 29, and will feature authors Sigmund Diamond and Ross Gelbspan.

Diamond is the author of Compromised Campus, an in-depth look at the FBI's subversive use of college faculty and students in monitoring "dissent" on the campuses of Harvard and Yale during the McCarthy era.

Pulitzer Prize winner and former reporter for the Boston Globe Ross Gelbspan is the author of Break-ins, Death Threats and the FBI. His investigative research exposes how the FBI has targeted various organizations because of their political associations with Latin American countries.

Saturday, April 17's lectures will be held in the Campus Center, Rooms 174-176 at 6:30 p.m. On Thursday, April 29, the lectures will be held in the Student Union Commonwealth Room (Earthfoods) at 7 p.m.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You will have to make the first move if you hope to land that special job. Taking the initiative also works to your advantage in romance. A parent child relationship improves after counseling.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Bright ideas and a lighthearted, go get-em attitude make you a leader. Friends learn that, in your company, the sun can shine even on a dark day. Devise a healthier diet.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): A wonderful day for affairs of the heart. Talk to a loved one about a mutual objective — it is attainable. The key is to make important decisions together. Speak from the heart.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Your high standards set a good example for others. Believe in your ideas and you will soon have lots of supporters. Buying some new clothes boosts your spirits and confidence.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): A strenuous exercise workout fires up your brain. You express your thoughts with style and wit. Seek assistance from experts before proceeding with risky investments.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Business activity could reach a new high today, producing better profits. The support of close allies will help you finalize an agreement. Avoid a direct confrontation.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Outstanding results will stem from a financial agreement negotiated today. A trip may be involved. You owe your success partly to a loved one's help. Romance will bloom with tender loving care.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Fun awaits you in rooms with thick walls. Avoid doing things on impulse. Serious upsets can be caused if one partner acts without first consulting the other.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Influential people will be encouraging with regard to a land deal. Listen attentively, then ask questions. Guard against marital discord this evening.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Close associates will cooperate with your efforts to increase profits. Conferences should produce excellent results. Friends continue to be helpful with events taking place at a distance.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): If you feel ready to make a big change, break away from old habits. Important people will be impressed with your perseverance. Avoid an urge to splurge or gamble this afternoon or evening.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): An intimate chat with a key person brings happy accord. Your love for intellectual pursuits helps you meet a new challenge. Avoid trying to rush things in romance. Play it cool.

reach.

Also playing well for UMass yesterday were Bill Edell and Wes Depp, who each had a goal and an assist. Eric Triolo (one goal) and Andy Fish helped round out the scoring for the Gorillas.

Lax Notes: Some telling statistics from yesterday's game:

UMass won 18 of 25 faceoffs, UNH 7-25.

UMass had 63 shots, UNH 26.

UNH had 13 penalties for 10 minutes and UMass only five for four minutes.

With 16 goals (14 last two games) and six assists in his last three games Millon needs only seven goals to break Scott Hillers all-time UMass record of 135 career goals and 11 to break Brooks Sweet career record of 172 career assists.

The victory over UNH yesterday must have been sweet for UMass head coach Ted Garber, as New Hampshire is his alma mater.

The Gorillas will play their home opener Saturday at 1:00 p.m. against the Blue Hens of Delaware.

the prep and set-ups for the afternoon and evening events and activities. This enables both students and faculty to request and make arrangements on how they would like rooms set up.

Desmond said he believes the second shift is the best shift.

"It's the best we got, I work with a great bunch of guys, its all teamwork," Desmond said.

Lucas Cote, an employee who at times finds himself handling emergency spills, also agrees that teamwork is the key to getting the job done.

"I've been with the team four years and what we do as a team does count. There are those who do not respect the work we do for them, I wish they would put on the other's shoe once in awhile," Cote said.

Cote says he values greatly the need to be educated in whatever field a person chooses.

"Student must really study hard and achieve good grades, it makes our jobs stand out when they eventually graduate," Cote said.

Dan Buckley, a member of the maintenance crew has quite a different history. He's been at UMass for 10 years and is also a 1990 graduate of the University. As a student, he had the opportunity to balance his "economic needs and academic goals at the University," said Buckley.

"There's so much life at this campus, students seems to be involved and if they really want to achieve something they must work hard at it," Buckley said.

Pete Keegan, the maintenance supervisor, is viewed by his co-workers as a valued ally and leader. He's been described a person who knows how to pull the team together.

"We're one great big family, it couldn't get any better than this and students can play a part by joining us in keeping UMass clean and in top shape," said Keegan.

on condition of anonymity, said the Group of Seven's program would include a $500 million fund to help promote small and mid size businesses in Russia. The fund would be put together with the European Bank for Minister Andrei V. Kozyrey, who is in Tokyo to keep an eye on the deliberations, held out hope for Japan it would recover the four sparsely populated islands in the Kuril chain.

Making preliminary arrangements for Yeltsin's visit, he told TBS television network, "The subject of the territorial problem will naturally be on the agenda."

The islands are a lingering symbol of Japanese nationalism and the dispute has kept Japan and Russia from signing a peace treaty. But at the urging of its Western partners the government of Prime Minister Kiichi Miyazawa put the issue aside to play a prominent role in the Yeltsin bailout effort.

Germany, which already has provided about $39 billion in aid to Russia on its own has been pushing all its Group of Seven partners to do more to prop up the former Soviet republic.

Sox off to best start since 1955

Will the real Red Sox please step forward? After an abyssmal 11-20 spring training, the 6-2 Sox are off to their best start since 1955 and are a starting to look like the dream team of 1967: an unsung group of overachievers who actually think they are a good baseball team — and they just may be.

Opening day, even though it was postponed for the first time since April 11, 1976, came and went with all the fanfare that it should have on Tuesday, and in the process the Sox beat the Indians 5-2 thanks to a triple by Mike "comeback player of the year" Greenwell, a couple of runs batted in by Mo Vaughn, and a home run by little Scott Fletcher. Fletcher, with his gritty, "Pete Rosesque" style of play, could prove to be one of the best off-season acquisitions by Lou "the walking heart attack" Gorman.

Yesterday, the home town boys did it again, beating the Indians by a 12-7 margin. Mo continued his hot hitting by going 4-4 with four RBI. Third baseman Scott Cooper has also been playing well of late and also went 4-4 with a couple of RBI.

BEHIND HOME PLATE
By Jeff Hojlo

But how about that one-two punch of Roger Clemens and Frank Viola? With both off to a 2-0, 1.20 ERA start, I'd pit the Sox pitching staff against the Atlanta Braves staff, with the likes of two-time Cy Young award winner Tom Glavine, Steve Avery and John Smoltz, anytime.

Old friend Lee Smith, now with the Cardinals, made history yesterday when he picked up the 358th save of his career, surpassing another ex-Sox closer, Jeff Reardon for first place on the all-time career save list. Reardon, if you recall, garnered first place on the list last year when he was playing with the Sox. As Bob Lobel says, why can't we get players like that?

The Pittsburgh Pirates cut loose former starting catcher Mike LaValliere, swallowing his $4.05 million contract in the process. The Pirates have lost 12 of 25 players through trade, free agency, or release from last year's National League East championship team. Still, something tells me that manager Jim Leyland will have his troops ready for the pennant chase at the end of the season.

The Yankees (Art Stapleton's favorite team: hate mail can be sent directly to Stapleton at the sports desk), I begrudgingly admit, have looked impressive so far with a 4-3 record. However, Wade "I won't miss the Green Monster" Boggs is falling flat on his face so far, hitting a Bob Ueckeresque .200. Many people are saying he's washed up but for the sake of baseball and Boggs career, I sure hope not.

Ageless Dave Winfield of the Minnesota Twins is off to a fast start with a league-leading nine ribbies. Winfield also tied some guy named Babe Ruth for 29th place on the career hit list Monday night with his 2,873rd hit.

On a historical note, Sherry Davis debuted as the first full-time female public address announcer at the San Francisco Giant's home opener on Monday.

Tammy Marshall returns to the NCAA Nationals

Women's gymnastics led by Abby May and Shaheda Keels finishes sixth at NIT

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

Senior Abby May and freshman Shaheda Keels scored their career high on beam and floor, respectively, leading the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team to a score of 189.60 at the National Invitational Tournament last Monday night.

May, competing in the last meet of her career, said going into the meet that she wanted to stay on the beam and hit, and possibly get a 9.80. She achieved her goal, nailing her routine and scoring her career high in her last career outing.

May said that she was shocked at first, but then she attributed her high score to that of junior Margaret Furtado, who received a 9.75.

"This whole year I've wanted to [get a 9.80], but I didn't think it was possible. Actually, it really helped that Margaret got a 9.75 before me," said May. "If the person in front of you does well, and then you hit, it helps your score.

"I still didn't think I'd get a 9.80. [When they put the score up] I was kind of in shock. I was psyched, and that was all I really wanted to do," said May.

Keels, one of three UMass all-arounders, had added more difficulty into her floor routine heading into the finale, and it paid off. She attained her career best 9.80 on the floor, and she said it was because she didn't make a big deal of the meet in general.

"I think I had such a good meet because I didn't make a big deal about it. It was the last meet, so I just went out and did my best," said Keels.

Taking its "nothing to lose" attitude into the meet, UMass was able to put some of its best routines together, including a school record 47.900 on the beam, en route to a sixth place finish. The archrivals of the Minutewomen, the Wildcats of New Hampshire, finished just .20 ahead in fifth place.

Assistant coach Sue Allen said the entire team was pleased with the way the season ended.

"It was a great way to end the season, and we're all happy about how everybody performed," said Allen.

Senior Lisa-Beth Cronen also finished out her college career in style as she left the Minutewomen with a solid performance. Cronen scored a 9.050 on vault, a 9.60 on bars, and a 9.35 on floor.

Tammy Marshall, UMass' top gymnast, had another fantastic meet as well, as she used the NIT as a tune-up for the NCAA National Championships, which start this evening at Gill Coliseum at Oregon State University.

Marshall scored a 9.80 on beam, and a 9.85 on both floor and vault, which won her the latter event. The senior is the defending champion on the vault, but she said that she will try not to think about defending her title.

"I've never hit at a National competition. I've always had one flaw somewhere. I really just want to go in there and end on a really good meet," said Marshall. "No matter what the score is, no matter where I place, just going in and doing the best I can.

"Of course, it's a goal of mine to go out and make finals. I'd love to go out there and be defending champion on vaulting, and possibly do something on floor, but I'm superstitious. I don't like to jinx myself."

Marshall will be one of the 12 best collegiate gymnasts competing for the title of NCAA all-around champion. West Virginia's Lajuanda Moody is favored to win the title, having scored a 39.05 in her regional event.

Moody and Marshall went head-to-head at the Atlantic 10 Championships, with Moody winning the all-around by only .05 of a point over Marshall, 39.20-39.15.

The first round of the Nationals is tonight, with the finals on Saturday. Mitchell said he thinks his gymnast has a shot.

"I think her chances are really good. If she hits her stuff, she should finish in the top six. Because she's going in with the right attitude, I think she'll do well," said Mitchell.

Eastern powers clash as softball hosts Hofstra

By JASON NASH
Collegian Staff

"Stalled, frustration, frustration."

These were the first words that came to mind when University of Massachusetts softball coach Elaine Sortino tried to describe this year's season so far. And rightfully so.

After Tuesday's rain postponement at the University of Rhode Island, (bringing the number of UMass cancellations this spring to 13 games), Sortino and company have yet to get their season started, having 33 games (almost all doubleheaders) in the next three-and-a-half weeks.

"In the last three weeks and four days, we've only played eight games and practiced outdoors three times," said Sortino. "It's like being stuck in the mud."

Tomorrow, the Minutewomen (7-12 overall, 3-1 in the A-10) will try and unstick themselves at 3 p.m. as they host the No. 1 ranked team in the region, Hofstra University (13-8 overall) for a doubleheader at Totman Field.

"They're a very good team," said Sortino, "and we're ready for them despite the fact that we clearly have had less of an opportunity to play. I told the kids that tomorrow is the start of our season."

Hofstra boasts some of the best talent in the nation, including two .400 hitters in Crystal Boyd (.422) and Megan Scharf (.418). However, UMass did play Hofstra last fall, splitting two games and giving the Minutewomen some bearing of how good this team is.

"They're a heads-up team with solid pitching and sound defense," said Sortino. "If anything, I think you're going to see some high-caliber pitching and great duel's from the mound."

UMass is led by smoking-hot senior catcher Sherri Kuchinskas, who is batting .396 which won her last week's Atlantic 10 player of the week honors and senior Stacey Nicolas, who comes in at a .293 clip.

While Sortino was originally dissappointed by Tuesday's cancellation, she said the postponement proved useful for her club, calling it "the best practice of the year."

"We got to work on a lot of things," said Sortino. "There was good production from the infield and outfield defensively and the kids got a look at some live pitching.

"Even little things like standing on the field and creating a situation; watching a bunt come off the bat in a gymnasium is completely different than one on a real field."

When asked about a final outlook on tomorrow's battle, Sortino remained upbeat and said it will be an intense contest.

"We'll have to play well and keep them off balance," Sortino said. "But I promise you, I won't need to give a motivational speech to get our kids ready."

Davis resigns as SID

Sports information director moves on

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Howard M. Davis, sports information director at the University of Massachusetts since 1980, resigned to accept a position within the University's department of sport management.

Davis, a SID since 1966, is a past president of the College Sports Information Directors of America and is a member of the CoSIDA Hall of Fame.

"I'm very happy to be moving into a different direction, and I'm ready to begin teaching," said Davis. "I feel it will be challenging for me, and I'm proud to be a part of a department which is considered one of the best in the country."

A 1966 UMass graduate, Davis was an SID at Kenyon College in Ohio and Springfield College before returning to the University. His wife Rae and daughter Jeri are also UMass graduates and his son Steve plans to graduate from the University next month.

Last Spring, Davis was honored by the University with its Distinguished Alumnus Award. He sat on the Board of Directors of CoSIDA for 11 years and has been the recipient of several professional awards in recent years.

He is the only SID to write a manual pertaining to the profession of sports information, "Basic Concepts of Sports Information," published in 1978.

"Speaking for the sport management faculty, we are delighted that an individual with Howie Davis' experience and contacts has decided to join our department," said Glenn Wong, dean of the School of Physical Education. Wong was formerly the interim athletic director.

"With Howie joining our staff we now have an opportunity to further expand and allow our program to strengthen its position as one of the most respected in the nation. It is great for our department to count an individual who is recognized as a national leader in his field among us," Wong said.

In the department of sport management, Davis, 49, will be the assistant department head for external affairs and director of internships. He will be responsible for undergraduate and graduate internships, publications, fund raising and the organization of panels, symposiums and other activities. He will teach a class on the undergraduate level.

UM Gorillas roll over UNH Wildcats, 14-7

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

After defeating No. 5 Brown University at its home field on Tuesday, the University of New Hampshire lacrosse team looked like a bunch of world beaters.

But the University of Massachusetts (5-2) was not phased by the upset win as it brought the Wildcats down to earth yesterday afternoon with a 14-7 drubbing in Durham, N.H.

The game started out like it would be nip-and-tuck throughout as UNH (2-4) led 4-3 at the half and was tied with UMass at the end of the third period, 6-6. But the Gorillas dispelled this notion in the fourth quarter by running off eight unanswered goals, including three by Mark Millon and two by Greg Kline.

The fourth-quarter run marks the second game in a row that UMass has won the game in the last frame. Against Yale on Saturday, the Gorillas trailed 12-7 after three quarters and won 14-13.

UMass scored the only goal of the first quarter when John Cavalerio (two goals, two assists) took a Ken Ward feed and beat UNH goalie Chris Smith (22 saves). The second quarter belonged to UNH though, as Jim Palmer (two goals, two assists) scored at the 1:04 mark to get things rolling.

After Millon (seven for the game) added a pair of goals for a 3-1 Massachusetts lead, the Wildcats scored two goals 35 seconds apart to tie the game and then Chris Grier (two goals) added his second goal of the quarter for a 4-3 lead.

UMass came out of the locker room on a mission, scoring three quick goals (two by Millon) to take a 6-4 lead. New Hampshire fought back, though, scoring two goals of its own to knot the game at six by the end of the third quarter. But the Gorillas' decisive run in the fourth put the game out of Gospel choirs remember Martin Luther King, Jr.

"We have a lot of fun with it. It's a good way to release tension," explained Fabiola Narcisse, president of the UMass Black Student Union and a member of the BSU's gospel choir.

Area gospel groups plan to commemorate the life and work of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. tonight at 8 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge in the Student Union in a program sponsored by the University's Division of Student Activities and featuring the Amherst College Gospel Choir, the Holy Temple Church of God Choir and the BSU Gospel Choir.

Originally just an idea last semester, the BSU Gospel Choir was formed under the direction of Natasha Springer and now boasts about 15 to 20 members. All are encouraged to join — even those who can't sing.

According to Penny Cameron, the group is open and needs people, especially those who would faithfully attend the important rehearsals before performances.

The group plans to sing "Can't Nobody Do Me Like Jesus" and the BeBe and CeCe Winans hit, "Love Said Not So."

Besides tonight's performance, the BSU Gospel Choir also plans to perform with the Gospel Choir of Vassar College, April 17, and at the BSU's Community Awards Banquet, May 8.

The Amherst Gospel Choir, under the direction of George Williams, has a Five College Area membership and has been singing for over two decades.

Asked about their participation in tonight's performance, Williams said, "(The group) just likes to perform. We just did our Easter Concert and wanted to keep the momentum going."

Professor Joy James of the University's women's studies department will speak at the performance on King's teachings, his civil rights work and the recent assasination of African National Congress leader Chris Hani.

The Black Student Union Gospel Choir is a student affiliated group and those interested in joining the choir may contact Natasha Springer at 546-5733 or for engagements, Penny Cameron at 546-0142.

What ever happened to those Wild Boys?

By GINA LARSON
Collegian Correspondent

You collected the albums, the posters and maybe even had the pillowcases when the '80s pop-culture fads ruled our top 40 radio airwaves. Now the Fab-five are back with their new album simply entitled Duran Duran. They're back on stage, on MTV and here in an interview with the Collegian. Bassist John Taylor — (Come on, of course you remember John) took on the task of answering the question that has been on so many of our minds — Where the hell have they been?

Collegian: So, where the hell have you been?
John Taylor: Well the last time we were on the road was in '89. Since then we have released a couple of albums — in 1990 we released Liberty, which really didn't get much commercialism or press, so the band decided not to tour the album. We felt that the band was going the wrong way, but we've been busying ourselves. We are always working and writing. We started the new album in January of '91 and finished about June of '92. We began touring the album during Christmas. We also got a new manager who wanted us to hold the album until the new year.

C: Is Duran Duran going to be an ongoing project — can we expect to see albums on a regular basis?

JT: Business isn't tuned to that type of regularity. The music industry wants the artist to turn over a new album once every year or two. We also don't want to burn out again and make people sick and tired of hearing us and seeing our face. So yeah, Duran Duran is an ongoing project, I don't see why I would stop making music with these guys.

C: How exactly do you feel about the music industry?

JT: The music industry exists to make money, it's that's simple. It will support an artist only while he's making money. If you [the artist] want to go out there and make a statement with your music, that's fine as long as you continue to make money while your doing so.

C: You once said when you first started out that you didn't know where you next meal was coming from. How did you know when you finally made it?

JT: It was during our first tour and our first show in Brighton, England for the album "Girls on Film." We had just done tons of pictures and photos for teen magazines, but we really didn't know the impact it had made. When we walked on stage there were just a bunch of screaming girls and we were just looking around saying 'What's going on?' But then we just said 'Let's jump around and do something.' There was just so much energy from that crowd that we kind of knew we were on to something.

C: When you were popular it was hard to pick up a copy of Teen Beat without seeing the faces of the Fab-five plastered on the front cover. Was that frustrating to you or the band?

JT: No, you want to communicate your music and image with anyone that will listen. You're just ecstatic that you're getting the coverage. Even the Beatles were on the cover of Teen Beat.

C: Your audience that were once pre-teens has now grown up. How are they reacting to you now that you've made a comeback?

JT: The first concert, as I said earlier, was just before Christmas and in between that show and our last show in '89. Since then, there have been just so many changes. I have a kid, I'm married, I was dealing with an alcohol problem — and I didn't know how the audience, especially in America, would react to us after the changes. But then when I got out there on the stage I felt that others have been going through the same stuff we were and they were growing up. In the '80s it was different. We'd walk out there there on stage and there would be hundreds of screaming faces that only had really one thing on their mind. But now I feel that they've grown up and we've grown up so in a way we changed together.

C: How do you view this album in comparison to your popular albums of the '80s?

JT: This album probably couldn't have been made in the '80s, just because of the attitudes that were present. In the '80s, everything was 'yeah, party!.' There's more sincerity and humanity in this album. Even the whole idea behind the song "Ordinary World" is to tell us that we have to deal with responsibility. As we get older there is more responsibility — there are kids, marriage, divorces, and breakups — and we just get bogged down and think 'Jesus, I wish life was simpler. I wish I could just go back to being a child.' And I think that everyone feels this way at one point in their lives and has wanted to unravel the knots of adulthood.

C: There seems to be a lot of rebellion in this new album — songs like "The Drowning Man" and "Too Much Info" — what is this attack rooted in.

JT: During the time we were making this album the Gulf War was going on, and the government seemed to be aware that they didn't want to treat the Gulf War like Vietnam. In Vietnam we saw the men getting shot in front of us on the T.V. and it made people back home want to stop the war. The Gulf War however, was presented to the public as a video game or a mini-series.

Classic closet tunes

Albums that deserve another listen

By BRIAN BABINEAU
Collegian Correspondent

Every college paper, college oriented magazine and college publication dedicates space to record reviews. As college students, we consume music with voracity, and are many times influenced by the record reviews we read (or that's what we writers like to think). Most of these reviews are dedicated to new albums — and rightly so. But all great music is not brand new, nor is it all well known. Thus, I am going to exercise my influence to review a few favorite albums, neither new nor well known. Consider this an offer for you to consume some of my favorite music meals.

The first album is Only Life by the Feelies. The Feelies were once called "the best underground band in the world," and this album is a testament to that statement. The guitar based album opens with the Velvet Underground-like title track which builds to a quiet crescendo with stuttering and strumming guitars.

The album manages to be eclectic, while keeping the very distinct Feelies sound. Vocalist Bill Million's monotonic baritone complements the dark dirge of "Higher Ground," which is propelled by minor piano chords. Great name, great band, plus an appearance in the movie Something Wild playing at a class reunion, what more do you want?

The next snack in my cabinet is The Chameleons. These Brits produced a number of incredible albums in the eighties, but the best way to experience the Chameleons is by purchasing The Peel Sessions. This contains a cross-section of all of the band's music from their five albums. Their sound is based on their two guitarists, who rely on echo effects and delays to create a completely unique musical texture. Singer Mark Burgess sings songs of both emotional and political angst with sometimes poetic lyrics that underpin the group's sound.

"Intrigue in Tangiers" is a gorgeous song that changes tempo from slow and acoustic to fast and plugged in with amazing tightness and effect. "Nostalgia" is existentially anxious, and lush keyboards soften the guitars' hard edge. My personal favorite, "Second Skin (Films)," contains beautiful rephrasing of the expression "don't know what you've got 'til it's gone," as Burgess sings: "When you fail to make the connection, you know how vital it is/ And when something slips through your fingers, you know how precious it is." Whew. Pretty deep stuff, but well worth it.

The final member of my three course musical menagerie here is The Blue Nile. Their second album Hats, is perhaps the most mellow and beautiful (am I overusing that word?) album I have heard. The songs are lush, keyboard filled affairs, that are as moody as film music and are reminiscent of Enya and Roxy Music sort of roiled into one big ball.

Songs like "Over the Hillside" and "Saturday Night" are long, but not drawn out, and singer Paul Moore sings about relationships with little-boy-like angst. "From A Late Night Train" is, unequivocally, the saddest and prettiest song I think exists (and believe me, I have heard a lot). Just piano and trumpet, as Moore sings "It's over now, I know it's over/ But I can't let it go." In the right mood, this album can be breathtaking.

Spring record releases

Albums fail to germinate good tunes

The coming of spring has brought a whole slew of new music with it. For the three bands fIREHOSE, Gumball, and Suede, however, perhaps hibernation would have been a better alternative.

Gumball's new album is Super Tasty. A better title would have been Super Drab or Super Cheese. The album is utterly disappointing throughout, with mediocre instrumental performances coupled with very weak vocals.

Caleb
COCHRAN

The first single, "Accelerator," includes some worthy guitar and percussion performances, but there needs to be some power behind the vocals here. There is none to be found. The fact that this is the first single off the album should tell you something right away. A gratuitous guitar solo at the end of the song only makes matters worse.

Super Tasty only goes downhill from there. "Hell of a Message," "Here it Comes Again," "Marilyn" and "Real Gone Deal" are just a few of the weak efforts included on this collection. If you want super tasty, you'd better head to Pizza Hut. There's nothing even remotely appetizing here.

Next up is the latest effort from fIREHOSE, Mr. Machinery Operator. The album's first single, "Blaze," is a furious rocker which includes decent singing and rip-roaring riffs on the guitar and bass. Another good find is "Rocket Sled/Fuel Tank." This tune has a hard, dangerous feel to it, again coupling the ferocious vocals of Ed Crawford with equally powerful instrumental performances.

Aside from these two tunes, Mr. Machinery Operator is basically a bust. "Formal introduction," "Herded into Pools," and "Quicksand" are a few of the bloody casualties that should have been left off the album. But without all the junk on Mr. Machinery Operator, there wouldn't be enough songs to make an album at all.

While the new releases from Gumball and fIREHOSE are pretty bad, Suede has released something much, much worse.

Their self-titled collection Suede is an absolute mess from start to finish. Apparently the band is a big hit in the U.K., but I have a feeling Americans will be less cordial in their reception.

"So Young" sounds like a bad Morrissey imitation, "Animal Nitrate" is emotional but awful, and "Moving" tries to rock out but just ends up sounding foolish. Some other gems include "Metal Mickey" (I'll let you imagine it), and "Sleeping Pills." Let me put this as delicately as I can: I'd rather drink a gallon of latex house paint than have to listen to this album again.

So, there you have it — an update of spring's latest sounds. After this listening session, I had no choice but to cleanse my ears with R.E.M.'s Life's Rich Pageant. If you want my advice, skip the new releases from Gumball, fIREHOSE and Suede and dust off an old favorite instead.

Caleb Cochran is a Collegian columnist.

A tourist's Etruscan discovery

Have you ever noticed that the lens through which we view the world and the role we play that corresponds with the lens constantly changes? I had finally decided that my experience here in Siena is more like regular life than that of a mere tourist, when a four day trip to Rome threw a wrench into the works.

Bumbling down the cobblestone street, loaded down with luggage at 6:45 a.m., my roommate Arielle and I temporarily forgot our immense excitement for the trip to the capital, opting instead to dwell on our desire to return to bed.

Emily
MARINO

At 7 a.m. sharp we boarded the magic bus with the rest of the students from the UMass program, and we were off. Three hours later (and many degrees warmer), we arrived in Rome, a huge city of ancient ruins, fast food restaurants, world-reknown artworks and sheik boutiques.

Our hotel, located minutes from the Colosseum, was clean, spacious and comfortable. The meals served in the hotel's restaurant were four course feasts, leaving me full and in need of a nap shortly afterwards.

In four days, we visited Vatican City (a full day in itself), the Forum, the Colosseum, Subiaco (the first monastery established in Italy by St. Benedict), Adrian's Villa and enough stores to make even the most die-hard shopper cringe.

By the end of the weekend, after having been shuffled through all of these (magnificent and breathtaking) tourist magnets, I was ready to go home to my own niche, friends and routine in Siena, where people don't immediately identify me as an American. In Rome, shop owners and random others spoke to me in English, assuming that I had no knowledge of the Italian language.

I suppose that with my camera practically glued to my eyeball and UMass backpack firmly in place it was relatively easy to deduct that I was a tourist. Nonetheless, negative comments and rude treatment from Italians sick of dealing with tourists (and justly so, in light of some of the ones I encountered) do get discouraging.

And then Saturday night came.

I guess all the praying that I did at the Vatican the previous day must have paid off, because somebody was smiling down on our group when we boarded the magic bus to a surprise destination.

An architecture professor from the Universita di Siena who was travelling with us told us that he had a wonderful surprise planned for dinner, and left us in the dark. After an hour of driving, we were beginning to doubt the good professor.

We arrived 15 minutes later to what looked like the middle of nowhere, the point past which the bus could not physically travel. We were then taken in shifts by three cars (all 25 of us) to what turned out to be paradise.

We stepped out of the cars into an ancient Etruscan village, left undiscovered for thousands of years. We hiked under the star-laden, midnight blue sky through sweet smelling fields, guided by the sound of a nearby waterfall. We were also led (by a smirking professor) through an eerie cave, seemingly into the bowels of hell. After two minutes of probing through the cool, damp cavern we emerged not 10 feet from the entrance.

After our walk we indulged in an amazing entourage of different pasta dishes, meats, vegetables, bread and bottomless bottles of wine. Stuffed to the gills, in between wine refills, we sang every song from Simon and Garfunkel's "Cecilia" to the Brady Bunch theme song. We danced, laughed and joked with the owners of the restaurant as well as the dozen or so other patrons.

By the end of the evening we were glowing (with the help of the wine, I'm sure) with happiness, having enjoyed a perfectly lighthearted, lively fiesta in a setting that felt as warm and welcoming as home.

On the way back to Siena on Sunday, I thought of how happy I was to be returning home.

I also smiled more than once remembering the previous night, and realizing that sometimes you find home in some pretty unexpected places.

Extrava-Ganja promises to be a weedy good time

By MIKE CARVALHO
Collegian Staff

Pot is hot. Marijuana legalization was a hot political issue on campus this semester, and the organizers of the "Extrava-Ganja" rally this Saturday are hoping that the intensity will carry over to this weekend's events.

The event, sponsored by the UMass Cannabis Reform Coalition, promises to be a sort of marijuana Lollapalooza — there will be four live bands, several speakers from area organizations, vendors selling food as well as hemp-related merchandise, and all sorts of other activities.

According to Coalition vice president Aaron Wilson, there will be tarot card readings courtesy of the Pagan Students Association, face painting, and a large drum circle. In addition, some political organizations will be distributing information.

The impetus for the rally is undeniably political, but the event is intended to be a party. "The most important thing," said Wilson, "is for people to get out and have a good time."

One of the area's hottest new bands, yeP!, will play their unique style of alternative music reminiscent of Phish and the Grateful Dead. Borderland, another valley band with a sizeable following, are slated to play blues rock at the hemp festival.

Synesthesia, a band which followed up a recent performance at the Hatch by taking some of their fans and forming a small drum circle of their own in the Campus Center Basement, should fit in well with the rest of the day's events. The group Harp & Friends & Heartsong will share folk music with the crowd.

The "Extrava-Ganja" will be the bigger-and-better sequel to last year's "End the War on Drugs" rally which was co-sponsored by the statewide marijuana reform organization, MASS-CANN. The UMass CRC is the sole sponsor of this year's festival, a project which the organization is able to afford due to an increased budget.

"Our membership is double what it was last year," according to Wilson, who said an influx of membership dues coupled with several profitable money-making events has made this year's "Extrava-Ganja" possible.

Speakers at the rally will include representatives from the UMass Cannabis Reform Coalition, MASS-CANN, Families Against Mandatory Minimums and CRC rally favorite Steven Levine from the Massachusetts Libertarian Party.

The Extrava-Ganja Rally will take place this Saturday on the Amherst Town Common beginning at 11 a.m. with live music starting at noon and continuing until 5 p.m. In case of rain, the event will be moved to the Student Union Ballroom on the UMass campus. For more information, call 546-3413.

A songwriter that exposes raw emotion

By IAN CANADINE

American Music Club
Mercury
Reprise Records

The singer/songwriter genre is one which has by now become largely redundant due to its own limitations and cliches, but there is always an exception that proves the rule, and American Music Club are that exception. On incontrovertibly classic albums like California and United Kingdom, their songwriter, Mark Eitzel, took the form to its limits, creating a music of almost disturbing emotional exposure.

In some of the most poignant and beautiful songs that you're ever likely to hear, Eitzel documents the little emotional tragedies of life that we've all lived through. These songs exist in a world of love and hate, broken relationships and broken hearts, late nights and drowned sorrows. It's a sad world, but somehow there's always a kind of quixotic hope that gives it an undeniable beauty, and that's the key to the doomed romance of American Music Club.

By this point in the proceedings it must be apparent that I am an unredeemable fan of the band. This might put my critical distance into some sort of doubt, but I must confess that I was kind of suspicious about how their new album, Mercury, was going to sound. These suspicions stemmed from the slight AOR leanings of Everclear, their last LP, and are unfortunately confirmed by Mercury. Somewhere along the line Eitzel's songs seem to have lost their impact, that indefinable quality that made them so captivating.

The main problem with the album is overproduction, a sense the songs are just too cluttered, and, in "Challenger" and "Apology For an Accident," drowning in ham-fisted guitar. The best example of these flaws is the enigmatically titled "What Godzilla Said to God When His Name Wasn't Found in the Book of Life," which die hard fans might be more familiar with as "Nothing Can Bring Me Down" (from Eitzel's solo live LP Songs Of Love). The delicate melody and haunting chorus of the latter version are all but lost beneath the extraneous effects of the former, but you know that somewhere inside there is a good song struggling to get out.

What made such classics as "Kathleen " and "Last Harbour" effective, was the fact the ravaged emotion of their lyrics was matched by the minimalism of their music. This minimalism is largely lost on Mercury, in favor of a more listener-friendly gloss.

But there are still some impressive tracks here, and these are the ones which retain some sparsity, as on "Gratitude Walks" and "Will You Find Me?" Best, though, is "I've Been A Mess," which starts with solitary acoustic guitar, and gradually builds into irresistable drunken sway of the chorus — "I couldn't begin to tell you/ Just how pale I get with out you/ I've been a mess since you've been gone." This is Eitzel in more characteristic form, his world weary voice just an inch away from breakdown, but always aware of the absurd humor of the whole thing.

I suppose its unfair to expect any artist to constantly live up to the standard of their best material, but it's frustrating when a band that means so much to you looses touch with whatever it was that made them so special. If you're just curious then you might treat it as a point of entry, but try to hear California or United Kingdom for a drop of the real strong stuff.

We didn't see the blood that we saw in Vietnam. One of the news stations was showing the war as an opportunity to say 'Look at all these neat weapons we have to protect us. Aren't you glad we didn't cut the military budget?' This part of the military disgusted us and we wanted to attack that aspect of the media.

C: If you had to pick one emotion to associate the new album with, which emotion would you choose and why?

JT: Hmmm . . . Anger. This album was born out of a lot of anger. It's been a struggle for the band to come to terms that we were, well, basically dismissed and ignored. On one hand we were very lucky and extremely grateful for the success that we did have, but on the other hand there was a lot of frustration in just losing that, and there is, I suppose, an underlying nastiness to a lot of the songs.

C: What do you find different about the '90s music scene, style or attitudes, that is different from the music scene of the '80s?

JT: Styles have really changed. For a while I really got into rap music — Cypress Hill and such. It really impresses me how it has become such a big part of the musical language. Rap was practically non-existant 10 years ago. Then you had the whole Seattle grunge scene move that pushed local artists into the Music Industry, it kind of reminded me of the way kids reacted to the English punk scene.

C: Was there a particular style you were trying to go for on the new album?

JT: There is a dance type feeling to some of the songs. In another song you'll find a Latino feeling. We're not like The Cure where you know what kind of music your going to find. We get bored playing the same stuff. I personally was into Acid type music and started to get really into that when we were making the album, so that really affected me and we tried to throw in a song with those influences. You can find a lot of acoustic on the album.

Weld reverses decision to close hospital

By JEFF DONN
Associated Press

WESTFIELD — Battered by a wave of protest, Gov. William Weld reversed himself and announced Thursday he will keep open state-run Western Massachusetts Hospital.

The move marks a rare about-face for Weld, who has turned the privatization of many state services into a centerpiece of his Republican administration.

"I think it shows that we mean what we say when we say we're not going to close institutions unless there's equal or superior care available for every single patient there," Weld said.

"It shows that we're not closing institutions just for the sake of closing them."

His reversal saves a 104-bed chronic care hos

Protests persist in S. Africa

Hani's assassination sparks nationwide wave of violence

By BARRY RENFREW
Associated Press

PRETORIA, South Africa — The government threatened a security crackdown and urged swifter progress toward ending apartheid Thursday after nationwide violence during memorials for slain black leader Chris Hani.

Senior government ministers said multiparty talks on sharing power with the Black majority must proceed as quickly as possible.

But they said further unrest would not be tolerated.

"The current wave of violence . . . should immediately come to a stop," said Constitutional Affairs Minister Roelf Meyer. "Violence can make no contribution to the achievement of solutions."

Government officials said extra troops would be deployed and police would be given expanded powers of detention in areas hit by violent protests Wednesday. At least seven people died and hundreds were wounded, many by police gunfire.

Further violence is feared during weekend protests and at Hani's funeral in Johannesburg on Monday.

The African National Congress condemned the looting and violence, blaming it on "unruly elements."

"No region had actually anticipated the massive turnout and in many instances our preparations were inadequate," said ANC spokesman Pallo Jordan.

Black and White leaders are struggling to prevent anger over Hani's killing from derailing the talks to end apartheid.

The talks have been suspended for a week until the ANC copes with the killing of Hani, one of its top leaders and head of the Communist Party. But the government and the ANC have said they will press ahead with the power-sharing negotiations.

Meyer urged all political parties to tackle the talks with renewed zeal.

"It is the government's serious intention that a successful outcome to the negotiations should be made as soon as possible," he said.

A White right-wing extremist has been charged with killing Hani last Saturday in the driveway of his suburban home.

The violence hit five cities, with some protesters attacking and looting businesses and shops. But many protesters were peaceful and the violence was relatively modest in a country where dozens of people die weekly in political and criminal violence.

Housing Services plans installation of peepholes

By MICHAEL WEBBER
Collegian Staff

In an effort to make the residence halls safer places to live, Housing Services has begun equipping dormitory doors with peepholes and plans to have them installed in all rooms by the end of the summer, a housing official said.

Assistant Director for Maintenance and Operations John Findley said the idea to install peepholes arose from requests by students and resident assistants for increased security measures in the dorms.

Work has already begun in the Orchard Hill residential area, where residents of the Dickinson and Webster dorms began getting the fire-safe "door viewers" about a week ago.

Although most of the installations will be done over the summer, Ted Mone, operations manager for Orchard Hill and Central, said they were "getting an early start" in his area.

He said residents there receive a notice 48 hours in advance of the installation, and that to avoid disturbing students' studying, no installations will be done during finals.

He said peepholes had been installed in all RA's doors last fall, and that any new doors put in also had peepholes in place. For example, John Adams tower in Southwest, which is presently closed for renovations, is getting all new doors, he said.

Housing bought 6,000 of the peepholes at $4.09 apiece, and with labor costs, the total cost for the project will come to $31,740, Findley said. All labor will be performed by Housing Services employees and paid for out of housing trust funds.

He said work might have begun sooner, but it took several months to find suitable peepholes. The peepholes being used are of a special design that does not degrade the integrity of the door in case of a fire, he said.

Quigley ends 30-year tenure

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

After a 30-year tenure at the Newman Center, Father Joseph Quigley announced his resignation this week.

Quigley has been with the Newman Center since its founding in 1963. Before the present center was built, he ran the Newman Club as a parish priest at St. Brigid's in Amherst.

Quigley was ordained at age 33, after serving in World War II. He received a marketing degree from Fordham University and trained to be a parish priest.

He first served as a parish priest at St. Mary's Parish in Westfield. The late Bishop Christopher J. Weldon called upon Quigley in 1960 to serve at UMass.

Quigley said he went reluctantly into the job, because Weldon had originally asked for volunteers. He has been on the UMass campus since that time.

Experts debate Bosnian crisis

Panelist expresses fears of U.S. military intervention

By BRIAN C. O'NEILL
Collegian Staff

As part of a lecture series, "Bosnia Under Siege," three experts gave different views on the Bosnian crisis Wednesday night at Mount Holyoke College. The series is being put on by the five-college Friends of Bosnia group.

The three speakers were Sean Gervasi, an economist and writer, Susannah Sirkin, the deputy director of Physicians for Human Rights and Randolf Ryan, an editor and columnist for the Boston Globe.

Gervasi said he feared the United States could be using military intervention as early as this spring, leading to the same kind of mass hysteria that was going on during the Vietnam War.

"A war on the edge of Europe at this time, with this kind of economic crisis going on . . . would be extremely dangerous to all the people in the world," Gervasi said.

Gervasi described the history leading up to the crisis, and how Yugoslavia has been closely linked to the West economically. He also showed some evidence of a secret initiative that Reagan signed to undermine the Soviet bloc countries. The western European countries, especially Germany, by using their intelligence agencies, have helped to undermine Yugoslavia, Gervasi said. This scheme was later criticized by Ryan as being "looney."

"In my opinion the major powers are not trying to stop the conflict — they are trying to prolong it," Gervasi said.

Sirkin's group, Physicians for Human Rights, documents cases of abuse with professional skills.

"The aim of the group is to hold those responsible for the atrocities accountable," Sirkin said.

Sirkin told of some of the abuses committed by all sides in the conflict. She showed slides of a trip to Bokavar where Physicians for Human Rights were investigating a mass execution. There were reports of 200 hospital patients taken out to a barren area and shot. Although the forensic team has found some bodies, they have not yet been completely uncovered.

"Some grave breeches of the Geneva convention have occurred from all sides in this conflict," Sirkin said.

Approximatly 810,000 have been displaced, there are 10,000 detainees and between 20,000 and 50,000 rapes, Sirkin said.

"Thousands if not tens of thousands have been systematically executed, and there have been 109,000 deaths since the war began," Sirkin said.

Ryan then discussed media distortions of the crisis. Admitting that when he was first asked about media interpretations, Ryan said he did not consider it to pertain to the Bosnian War.

Ryan then asked audience members how they felt about aspects of the media coverage surrounding the war. There were mixed reactions from the audience.

"The Serbs have been getting away with murder, not because the U.S. public doesn't understand what is going Benefit — Ninth Annual Hunger Clean Up, a work-a-thon at local community service centers to benefit relief efforts, will be held on Saturday, April 17. Sponsored students will work three hours at local hunger and homelessness aid organizations by painting, cleaning and providing other needed services. National goal is $180,000. Those interested can either volunteer or sponsor someone else. For more information, call MassPIRG at 545-0199.

Clean-up — ARISE for Social Justice will be opening up the Self Reliance Center, a community center for low-income people in the Springfield area, on May 1, 1993. On Saturday, April 17, there will be a kickoff clean-up of the space for the center at 501 Worthington Street in Springfield. The doors will be open 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. and everyone is welcome to stop in.

Basketball festival — Haigis Hoopla 3-on-3 basketball festival will be held at UMass April 23-25. The event is open to people of all ages and skill levels. The early registration fee of $12 includes a t-shirt, the Friday, April 23, shooting contests and tournament play on April 24-25. Registration forms are available at Uptown Pizza, Rafters and Athletic Clubs of America or call the Haigis Hoopla office at 545-3971.

UMass Police Log

Compiled by Brian Gormley

Recent incidents recorded by the University's Department of Public Safety.

Burglary/Breaking and Entering

• Monday morning staff in the Fine Arts Center reported a locked area assigned to Production Services was entered. A Fax-Phone, a copier and a Desk Jet Printer were stolen. The total value of the goods was reported at $4,200.

Larceny

• Monday afternoon an individual reported her coat stolen from the sixth floor of the University Library where she was studying. The coat was valued at $100.

• Monday evening an individual in Field reported her bicycle stolen from the seventh floor where it was locked and secured. The bicycle was valued at $400.

Accident-Property Damage

• Monday night two vehicles on Massachusetts Ave. collided when one of the vehicles attempted to change lanes. There were no injuries. Damage was estimated at $5,500.

• Tuesday morning a vehicle moving through the parking lot on University Drive failed to observe a second vehicle exiting a lane and collided. The damage was estimated at $2,000.

Correction

In the Friday, April 8 issue of the Collegian it was reported that George Fitzgerald is resigning as president of the University Democrats. Fitzgerald is giving up his signature power, not resigning as president.

Also, in the Thursday, April 14 Collegian, it was incorrectly reported that the Pagan Student's Association would provide tarot card readings Saturday. Members of the Pagan Student's Association will be on the Campus Center Concourse next Tuesday to provide readings.

The Collegian regrets the errors.

Minority engineering director hired

The University has named Julius T. Randall as associate director of the Minority Engineering Program in the University's College of Engineering.

The Minority Engineering Program provides academic support for minority students enrolled in engineering and also conducts a six-week pre-college program, Minority Engineering Freshman Orientation, for freshmen and community college students.

Randall, who will replace Dwight Tavada, was the academic coordinator at William Paterson College in New Jersey for the past four years. Tavada now recruits and retains minority engineering graduate students at the General Motors Institute in Michigan.

Randall holds a bachelor's degree in computer science from the New York Institute of Technology and a master's degree from the Pratt Institute in New York.

Health Services accredited

University health services has received a three-year Certificate of Accreditation by the Accreditation Association for Ambulatory Health Care, Inc.

Three years is the longest term of accreditation offered by the AAAH. In order to receive accreditation, Health Services underwent an extensive on-site survey of its facilities.

Amherst president to step down

Amherst College President Peter R. Pouncey announced earlier this month that he will resign as president of Amherst College on June 30, 1994.

Pouncey was formerly a professor of classics at Columbia University when he was elected by the Amherst trustees as Amherst's 16th president in July, 1983.

Pouncey said he will take a sabbatical leave for the 1994-95 academic year and then rejoin the college's faculty as a professor of classics.

University to sponsor Russian filmmaker

Russian filmmaker and journalist Marina Goldovskaya will give a showing of her most recent documentary, "Shattered Mirror," at 7:30 p.m. on Monday, April 19 in Merrill III at Amherst College.

Goldovskaya is currently the Distinguished Visiting Luce Professor at Vassar College. She has made more than 50 films and received 24 film awards.

Goldovskaya's visit is sponsored by the University's Interdepartmental Program in Film Studies, Amherst College's Russian department and the Five College Peace and World Security Studies Program.

Professors receive awards

• Associate Professor of History David Glassberg has been awarded a fellowship from the National Endowment for the Humanities.

Glasseberg, who heads the history department's public history program, will use the fellowship to research the role of historical images in American culture.

Glassberg has taught at the University since 1986. He received his bachelor's degree from the University of Chicago and his masters and doctoral degrees from Johns Hopkins University.

• University of Massachusetts forestry Professor David B. Kittredge Jr. has received the James W. Toumey Award from the New England Society of American Foresters. The award recognizes outstanding service to the Society.

Kittredge, who has taught at the University since 1987, received his bachelor's degree from the University of Vermont, and his master's and doctoral degrees from Yale.

TOC's board has open positions

By DANIEL BOUCHER
Collegian Staff

Any students who are over the age of 21 and want to have a voice in the operations of the Campus Center bar facilities can attend the Top of the Campus Board of Directors' annual meeting on May 13, the director of the Campus Center told the Board of Governors last night.

Students who attend the annual meeting can run for one of the 12 available seats on the TOC directors' board, said Bill Harris, director of the Campus Center.

Harris said students used to sit on all 12 directors' seats, but students' interest in the board has declined since the drinking age was raised to 21 in the mid-1980s.

Harris also said administrators have taken a bigger interest in the past few years. There are presently six students and six administrators on the TOC board.

The Board of Governors last night also postponed elections for treasurer until April 29 because one of the board's candidates failed to attend the meeting.

The board required any candidates running for treasurer to attend training sessions before the election with current treasurer Mylie Needle to make the transition smoother.

The board also appointed members to the board's six committees.

The executive committee prepares the board's agenda each week and acts as the board's "steering body." The building operations committee deals with internal constructions for the Campus Center. The budgets committee reviews the board's budget, and the program council helps produce programs in the Campus Center and Student Union.

The vending committee helps to register vendors on the Campus Center Concourse, and the food service committee is an ad hoc committee that evaluates the Hatch, the Bluewall and the TOC restaurant.

Lab fees to be replaced by curriculum fees

By MICHAEL R. LINSKEY
Collegian Staff

Effective next semester, the University will eliminate lab fees and replace them with a $75 annual increase in the curriculum fee, according to a University official.

Speaking before 48 faculty senators last week, Provost Glen Gordon said the increasing tendency of departments to charge lab fees necessitated the change.

"For those of us who have been here a while, you remember that lab fees used to be a relatively rare activity which was applied to courses that actually had labs," he said. "But with the decline in our state budget, it became necessary for departments, in order to offer courses and support instructional activities, to start adding lab fees."

Gordon said all undergraduates paid lab fees this year, and departmental fiscal year 1994 plans called for an additional 20 percent increase. He said the request could not be honored due to widespread displeasure with current levels.

"The whole damn fee thing is increasingly looked upon by students and parents as a problem of truth in advertising," he said. "We have told our students in our catalog what they are paying when they get here. They get here, they finally pay their tuition and fees, and then about three weeks later they get hit with another batch of fees. They don't like it, and they've let us know they don't like it.

Gordon tried to assuage senators' fears that new fee money would be allocated differently by saying there will be no noticeable distribution change. Professors must submit budget plans to department chairs, who then submit departmental budget requests to the provost's office.

pital in Westfield with social units for victims of coma, AIDS, multiple sclerosis, cancer, Alzheimer's and other diseases.

"Our patients are going to be allowed to keep their home. Our families can begin to let all this anxiety and stress of three months rise up and go away," exulted Jackie Sullivan, the hospital's director of quality management. "The employees have their jobs."

It was the second time in 10 years that the hospital has escaped death. Gov. Edward King also talked of closing it and then did a turnaround.

In their latest rescue operation, hospital workers and supporters contended that their patients could not find equal treatment elsewhere in the region. "A very important part of the overall medical delivery system in the greater Springfield area has not been exercised," said hospital director Blake Molleur.

"It's like a happy party," declared Dexter Chicklis of Chelmsford, a wheelchair-bound patient with multiple sclerosis. "We didn't want to be wandering around looking for a hospital."

More than 40,000 people signed petitions protesting the closing of the 83-year-old hospital. The state legislature was about to take final action Thursday on a bill aimed at stalling the closure.

Editorial/Opinion

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers or cartoonists and do not necessarily reflect those of the Collegian unless otherwise noted.

Men and women might as well live on different planets

"I'm not a sexist, I just don't like women."—Anonymous

Walking down to the Collegian without a hard topic to write about is sometimes a very dangerous experience. You never know what the focus of your editorial will be.

Whoever decided that men and women should have to share the Earth really wanted to roll the dice. It's a flawed concept, really, to put the two genders on the same planet.

God is a smart guy; he could have put women on Venus and left men on Earth, or vice versa. When it was time to procreate, we would travel by spaceship for a weekend, then return after the deeds were done. Things would probably be simpler.

My perceptive readers will say, "What about family values? You want these families to be splintered? You don't want men to raise their children?"

That problem is already taken care of. Men and women would have to apply for a marriage license just like they were interviewing for a job. Those accepted would be placed on yet another planet, so as not to ruin it for the rest of us single folk.

I guess my problem with women lies in that they are different from men. When was the last time you said something to your friend/girlfriend/fiance/wife, only to have her say, "I don't understand?" If your answer is, "Five minutes ago," we're in the same boat.

Women consume and distribute information differently than men, which is the reason for most of the communication disorders in our society. Men are like dogs, and women more like cats, so what you have are a lot of people fighting like cats and dogs.

Michael MORRISSEY

Walking around campus will allow you to see men and women of all races, religions and creeds bickering incessantly. Once in a while you may see a happy couple, so bring a camera with you if want a rare snapshot.

There are those who think that I want to blame everything on women, but that just isn't true. I have quit trying to figure them out after years of unsuccessful attempts. They can be as mysterious as they want when they're around me.

Women are exotic, beautiful, intelligent, loving creatures who at times drive men crazy. Men do the same thing to women, I'm sure someone will say. They're right.

College is a particularly interesting time for man-woman relationships because everyone thinks they're ten times smarter than they are, everyone gets drunk on weekends, everyone has a bed nearby, and everyone has the library to hide in for the next two weeks. Hence the dating ritual.

Maybe life was better when marriages were arranged. There were no foolish rituals involving dating, there were few unwanted pregnancies and hardly any deadbeat fathers.

There wasn't a whole lot of love between strangers who met for the first time at the aisle, but there doesn't seem to be much love today either. Instead there are assaults and restraining orders.

As with most things, there are no easy answers. Women will always be opposite to men, but the two genders must find a better way to resolve differences before we kill each other. Women are different. That's what makes life so great — and so frustrating.

L.A. from the eyes of a native

I will never forget the day I turned on my television and saw rioting in the streets of Los Angeles. But what I will never, ever forget is the moment when I called my house in Long Beach, a suburb of L.A., and I got a recording that stated: "Due to problems in your area, your call cannot be connected."

It took me 24 hours to reach my mother, and they were 24 hours of unadulterated hell as I wondered whether my house was still standing, and if the life of my mother was safe. Nothing was more sad than watching the city that I call home stand in a state of anarchy.

Catherine B. PULLEY

In May, I stepped off the plane and my friends drove me home to Long Beach. As we arrived my friends asked me if I wanted a guided tour of the riots. My "tour" included a view of the mall that was looted and destroyed, a Department of Motor Vehicles that was burned to the ground, and small stores that were destroyed. I was told of the firemen who were shot and killed in cold blood as they were trying to put out the fires, and how the National Guard roamed the streets. Korean business owners stood on the roofs of their businesses with shotguns, and people set fire to their businesses to collect the insurance money.

One year, over 60 lives and millions of wasted dollars later, L.A. is a time bomb that is ready to explode. People are afraid and they have good cause to be. I sit helpless in Amherst while my 64-year-old mother is a hostage in her own home, and now she is informed by the police of the extremist groups that are threatening to torch all the nice neighborhoods in L.A., Orange County and my home, Belmont Shore in Long Beach. My mother has been told that when the verdict comes out she is to lower her shades, stay away from the windows, lock the doors, bring the cars in and be aware of snipers and possible drive-by shootings.

L.A. does not prepare too much. It is simply a city that is 11 months pregnant. It is a city that lies on a fault line that is full of unexpressed anger and rage. And if it is necessary to put up concrete barricades in front of the federal building and call out the National Guard to protect innocent people like my mother, so be it.

Police brutality is a problem that we all need to face and deal with. Racism, anti-Semitism and sexism are also things we need to fight in our society. But violence is never an answer. If we followed the teachings of Dr. King and Gandhi, we would learn that violence is never the answer to our problems and causes more pain and anger in the end.

But one thing to remember: no one in L.A. and the surrounding cities started to riot until the mayor of Los Angeles, our wonderful Tom Bradley, declared anarchy in the streets of Los Angeles and to express their anger in rage.

Well, Tom, tell that to the families of the innocent victims, the business owners who have lost everything, the people of Watts who have not had their neighborhoods touched since the Watts riots in the 1970s and to the many people who were left without homes in South Central. I'm not saying that Bradley is the cause of the strife in Los Angeles, but it is only to prove the point that we need to think before we act — and it doesn't matter if you're in L.A., Boston, New York, Springfield or Amherst.

Now as I await the verdict, I pray for a jury that finds the officers guilty — not only for the sake of justice, but for the sake of my friends that serve in the National Guard Reserve, my friends and family, the innocent victims and for the city that I love.

Catherine B. Pulley is a UMass student.

Watch out for critical thinking

I, too, am struck dumb by the insensitivity of our Spanish department ("Graphic Spanish film in poor taste" [Collegian, April 8]).

How could we dare show a film (Spanish 240) that left a student with an afterimage "lingering in his mind" long after leaving the class? Deplorable. This, in an institution that makes every effort to insure we serve only McKnowledge, boneless, cut up for you, pre-chewed and pre-digested. Who authorized lingering thoughts? I want a full investigation.

How could we dare show a film that shocks, that reflects a grim, unsavory reality? Abominable. Critical thinking, or worse, can only come of this. And from there — freedom, that bastard child of anarchy.

So I say: stamp out the Spanish department.

No: stamp out Spanish filmmakers. And Spanish TAs, Spanish rice, Spanish Harlem, the Spanish Armada and the Spanish fly. Better: stamp out UMass. And your neighbor. And confrontations. And re-evaluation of violence, fear and hate as solutions.

Stamp out art. Stamp out truth. Stamp out reality.

Kelly Washbourne
Teaching assistant
Department of Spanish and Portuguese

Violence in film teaches reality

I feel compelled to comment on a letter concerning the film The Official Story [Collegian, April 8]. The author argues that the film was in poor taste because it contains "a rather graphic and disturbing wife-beating episode" which lingered in his mind and apparently made it difficult for him to study. He argues that "with the rising rate of domestic abuse in this country. . . showing the film was in rather poor judgment."

The Department of Spanish and Portuguese does review the films it allows students to see beforehand and chooses those which are appropriate in terms of their use of language and their general educational relevance.

The Official Story was a critically acclaimed film shown around the world. It was one of the first which explored the disappearances that occurred during a period of tyrannical rule in Argentina. The wife-beating scene was crucial to the story and to the explanation of life in Argentina at that time. Surely one must ask whether we have a better chance of dealing with domestic violence by showing it in a realistic context than we would if we shut our eyes to it.

Violence against women will not cease to exist if we don't show it. The film succeeded if it lingered in the mind and made it difficult to dismiss as a piece of fiction. Even if the student found it difficult to study, he may have learned something.

Dancers share life's music

And they danced. There was no music, so he sang to her. She gripped his hand tightly as they swayed back and forth in the long shadows of late afternoon.

She did not look at him; she was embarassed, but he kept right on singing. He could see the smile growing out of the corner of her mouth and he knew that she felt the same thrill, the same excitement of a new romance.

Jeff MCKENZIE

They had met only a little earlier that same afternoon, introduced by a mutual friend. As far as he knew, he had come along only to observe, to see his friend work with these special people, but now, he was, well, dancing.

"You dance very well," he said as they turned slowly across the empty parking lot, "You must do a lot of dancing."

She looked up a little, and her smile grew.

"Have you been dancing for long?" he continued.

"Since. . . since I was a young girl," she returned, still looking at the ground.

"A young girl? Well, how old are you now? You certainly couldn't be a day over 18."

"Eighteen? No — I'm 69 years old; I was born in July."

"July of. what year, 1970? You're no more than 20, I'm sure!"

"No, I was born in July, in. . . 1910. I'm 69 years old."

"1910? That would make you more than 69; no, I'm sure you're 21."

She looked up, enough this time to catch his eye. He was smiling at her, and he squeezed her hand.

"You're funny. You make me laugh," she said.

I make her laugh, he thought. He had never felt better about making someone laugh.

They danced a few more turns until the first cool breezes of dusk swirled around them.

"Time to go in, everyone!" called someone from across the lot. "Yvonne, don't you try to keep John out there dancing all night!"

Yvonne chuckled, and led him by the hand towards the building where the other were filing in. The woman in blue at the door was asking people if they enjoyed their time outside.

"Dot, you played wonderfully in volleyball tonight," she said as Dot's wheelchair rattled over the doorstep. Dot slowly smiled and lifted her hand.

"We had a great time," said the tall young man pushing her chair, "but now we're hungry!"

"Well, there's plenty of food. . . and you two —" she turned to John and Yvonne, "I thought we'd have to carry you both in." She smiled at John as Yvonne pulled him by.

They sat watching TV and talking while they ate.

She told him that she was born in Canada and moved to Lynn to work when she was young. He told her that he was going to work after he graduated, but he wasn't sure what he was going to do. She said that that was O.K., and that she worked at a shoe factory in Lynn. She told him that when she was young, she loved chocolate, and that she ate so much, it made all of her teeth fall out. She even showed him that it had. He laughed.

"You're funny," he said to her, and they both laughed. They laughed and talked until it was time for Yvonne and the others to go upstairs.

"May I have one more dance before we part?" John asked in a funny accent.

She looked down at the floor and smiled, then took his hand.

So they danced. She was old and her body was tired; he was young and strong, but they turned graceful circles on the floor, moving as one to the music that they both heard.

It was the music of spirits being joined, if only for a short time, the music of laughter, the music of friendship, the music of life.

And they danced.

around him, and there are many such events," Chancellor Richard O'Brien said in a statement. "We shall all miss him terribly."

Quigley has been the the director of the Newman Center for 15 years and a chaplain for 18 years in Amherst. While under his direction, the center established annual benefit fundraisers and a development office.

"Father Quigley has been an enormous resource to the community. He's always willing to help whenever called upon, even though there is no official connection between the Newman Center and the University," Jo-Anne Vanin, dean of students, said.

Vanin said Quigley was willing to talk to students and their families. She also said he discussed quality of life issues with University administrators.

"He'll be sorely missed. I speak for many when I express my gratitude to him," Vanin said.

Quigley announced his resignation in the Newman Center bulletin, "Communitas." According to the bulletin, he submitted his resignation to Springfield Archdiocese Bishop John A. Marshall April 6, effective Aug. 1.

The Archdiocese has yet to name a successor, according to Quigley, but he said he plans to stay on at the Newman Center for another year.

Quigley said the Archdiocese decided to name a new director for the 30th anniversary of the Newman Center.

The Newman Centers are named after the late Cardinal John Henry Newman. They were conceived to give the Catholic Church a presence on secular campuses.

"The money will come in accordance with registration data, and the amounts collected will be sent to the departments just the same way as when the fees were individualized," he said. "What that means is, if you miscalculate and have fewer students than you thought in your plan, you'll get less money. If you get more students than you thought, then you'll get more money."

Senator Martha L. Olney, associate professor of economics, suggested the plan might encourage departments to "pad their requests for lab fees," but Gordon disagreed.

"The fiscal year '94 plan represents what the various faculty think they needed for lab fees — it's 20 percent over last year," he said. "We got that plan approved by the Trustees. That's it. Next year, you can't request new lab fees. What you get is in that plan. We will not approve more money than the '94 plan. Ever."

Gordon said the new arrangement will benefit students and staff by reducing paperwork and lines in Whitmore, and also by increasing financial aid eligibility.

"Since the lab fees were not `mandatory fees' — they were designated on a course-by-course basis — students who applied for financial aid could not ask them to pay lab fees," he said. "But now that the fees are part of the curriculum fee, they can qualify."

on, but because the leaders have not had the courage to be straightforward about it," Ryan said. "This is not like manifest destiny, this is a war deeply rooted in historical vendettas."

"I think that some of the actions of the Bosnian Serbs have been unspeakably grotesque. Their basic strategies have been to depopulate the areas that they want to annex," he said.

Ryan said he felt the solution to the conflict needs to include limited military intervention.

New magazine tries to be 'cutting edge'

By ADAM GOULSTON
Collegian Staff

It sure took a lot of Nerve to print this magazine! Haw, haw. Well. . . of all the Nerve! Chuckle, chuckle. Oh I've got more. I'm sure the staff of the upstart new "mag" Nerve would be glad to hear them. After all, their intent is to shock the public.

Nerve's press releases proudly boast of the release party for the first issue in which a giant cake was slashed with a chainsaw. Wow, these guys really are serious. They're cutting edge. Designed to appeal to that oft neglected yet highly influential crowd of 16 to 30-year-olds, Nerve is centered loosely around the alternative scene while still keeping abreast of politics and pop culture interspersed with a few cartoons and humor clips. Well hit me with a Rolling Stone until my head Spins.

Editor-In-Chief Legs McNeil has an impressive resume dating back to the mid-seventies and Punk magazine. Collaborating with a talented and experienced staff, McNeil's justification for writing another rock magazine was that he "was tired of buying rock'n'roll magazines and finding that when I got them home, there was absolutely nothing inside to read."

Well, luckily Mr. McNeil has saved this insubstantial industry by providing us with a publication which so proudly touts as its first headline, "Exclusive: My Dad is Charlie Manson!" True, tongue is implanted firmly in cheek. So firmly implanted, it leaves an impression.

MAGAZINE REVIEW

Sinead O'Connor herself is Nerve's first coverperson accompanying the byline, "Is Sinead Nuts? On the Couch with Rock's Bad Bald Girl." If Nerve indeed backed its hip sarcasm with substance in the form of well reported and skillfully written articles, it could have an appeal in a treacherous sort of way. Unfortunately, not only does Nerve look like a rag, it is one.

Issue #1 of "The Renegade Rock 'n' Roll Magazine" is splattered with ads for all the latest mainstream alternative releases and some lesser known labels such as Cargo and Rhino. These ads are perhaps all that's worth reading.

King Missile's Trick Dick purports to be a profile of the popular New York songsters, but the writing is worthy of a high school paper; strewn with gratuitous vulgarity and ultra-hip slang, ". . .whenever [Missile singer John S.] Hall stumbles on a clue he steps on his dick." Nice work, guys.

"Bono Vox Meets William Burroughs" has the potential for an intriguing interlude but ends up leaving all the impact of the local college DJ saying, "William Burroughs is so cool!"

Lenny Kaye, the former editor of Rock Scene magazine lends his typewriting to the article, "The History of Grunge." Now let's stop for a moment. What do we expect and want to hear? I'd like to hear tales about struggling bands who gained little respect only to find themselves the initiators of perhaps this decade's greatest musical movement as of yet, bands like the Melvins and Husker Du.

Instead the message becomes so convoluted beneath Kaye's loquacious verbosity (and what other kind is there?) that all we learn is that Al Capp was a cool cartoonist and the Sonics were a cool band. Thanks Lenny, you've been a big help.

Interspersed with the "Wilson Phillips Graffiti Contest!" (a chance to soil the mugs of those repulsive songstresses) and a blurb about homophobic performers are some legitimately serious political articles. There's one about "The New Urban Outlaws" in New Jersey and one about serial killer Charles Manson's son. However, being documented in the same forum as the previously mentioned fluff is only demeaning to these subjects.

To their credit, Nerve does include a decent profile on Dinosaur Jr., more specifically singer J. Mascis. It's quite legitimate in portraying Mascis' morose eeriness.

Please note the coverperson of the second issue was Motorhead's wart-faced Lemmie Killmister. . .big improvement. How rebellious! With a cover price of $2.95, your money's better spent on Rolling Stone, Spin or even People. Any of these provide a world of entertainment in comparison to Nerve. Nerve is the Teen Beat of the twenty-something generation.

Comedy benefit promises to make you chuckle

Comedian Jeff Altman will play the Spring Comedy Night on Tuesday, April 20 at 8 p.m. along with fellow funnymen Billy Martin and Warren Hutcherson. All proceeds from the show will go to Commuter Human Services.

In the mood for some laughs? School, work, significant other got you down? On Tuesday, three comics will make you laugh — guaranteed — when Commuter, Southwest and Orchard Hill Area Governments present their annual Spring Comedy Night.

This year's line-up includes a side-splitting trio of some of the funniest men to grace the Fine Arts Center stage in quite a while. But the roof isn't the only thing these comics plan to raise. All proceeds from the show will go to Commuter Human Services.

First up is funnyman Billy Martin, who has appeared on MTV's "Half Hour Comedy Hour" and A&E's "An Evening at the Improv," among others. Dean Johnson of The Boston Herald called Martin "witty, often unpredictable, and with no lulls, it was a pleasure to hear."

Martin's hip style has made him a favorite with the college circuit and clubs nationwide. Always witty and keenly clever, Martin promises to deliver a set that will make you roar.

The name Warren Hutcherson made not be familiar, but his brand of humor is unforgettable. You may have seen him on Showtime's "Showtime at the Apollo" and Fox's "Comic Strip Live" as well as VH-1's "Stand Up Spotlight" and A&E's "Caroline's Comedy Hour." Now you can see him live in person. Baltimore Magazine reviewed his act as "just as good, if not better than the headliners." You can see for yourself this Tuesday as Hutcherson brings his sharp wit to the Valley.

Then there's Jeff Altman. Hard to categorize, but not hard to laugh at, Altman has had an extensive career in film television and the comedy club circuit. His hilarious impressions, one-liners and silly views on life have kept audiences laughing for years.

Don't let the last month of classes get you down. Take a break and be prepared to yuk it up as Spring Comedy Night takes aim at your funnybone.

The Spring Comedy Night with Billy Martin, Warren Hutcherson and Jeff Altman will be presented on Tuesday, April 20 at 8 p.m. in the Fine Arts Center. Tickets are $5 and available at the FAC Box Office.

Mindless thrills in futuristic action film

By MARTIN BROWN
Collegian Staff

Here's one for anybody who doesn't like their movies too deep. Escape From New York is a futuristic action movie that takes a cool idea (New York as a prison), and does itself one better by having the ultimate bad-ass hero go into an urban hell to save the president.

Video Pick of the Week

The year is 1997, America is at war with the USSR, the crime rate has risen 400 percent. Manhattan Island has been turned into a maximum security prison. Once you go in, you don't come out. Due to a terrorist hijacking, Air Force One, the president's plane, crashes inside the prison. He is also carrying vital documents that will end the war. They need someone to covertly go in and save the president — enter one Snake Plissken, a decorated hero who, upon returning from the war, was caught trying to rob the Federal Reserve Depository.

Plissken is played by Kurt Russell in a performance that didn't win any Academy Awards, but like Jack Nicholson's Joker, isn't easily forgettable. He doesn't say that much in the movie, but when he does speak he uses a venomous whisper that's twice as effective as if he were yelling, which is typical of most action movies. It's kind of creepy watching Russell utter lines like, "When I get back, I'm going to kill you." or better yet, "The name's Snake."

Donald Pleasance (the old dude in Halloween) plays the president as pathetically as the part needs to be. Throughout most of the movie he is traumatized by the gang that holds him hostage. This sets up a couple of interesting surprises at the end of the movie.

Plissken also hooks up with a few other characters along the way. Harry Dean Stanton plays Brain, a supposed genius who works for the Duke (the bad guy) by fueling the gang's cars. Adrienne Barbeau plays Brain's squeeze, Maggie. Finally, Ernest Borgnine plays Cabbie, basically a weird old guy who drives cabs. All three of them put in solid performances, but it's Russell's show.

Isaac Hayes (from '70s soul fame) plays the Duke of New York. He's the brutal leader of the gang that holds the President. It's not really that important of a role though, because Plissken has plenty of other stuff to deal with along the way.

The movie has all the things that make action pictures fun to watch. You've got the big gun that shoots 80,000 rounds a second. You've got crazies running around so Plissken can have something to shoot at. You've got a bunch of cool gadgetry that is sure to be handy just in the nick of time. Finally, and most importantly, you've got a lot of explosions. You couldn't ask for more.

The movie was directed by John Carpenter who back in the '80s was one of the "hot" directors. His work includes Halloween, The Thing, Christine and the stylish Big Trouble in Little China. He does a good job here by not letting things get too silly nor too serious. Considering the movie came out in 1981, the special effects are pretty cool too.

If you're looking for a deep profound movie that will change your life, this isn't it, but if you're looking for an exciting action flick that has just the right mix of firepower and plot, check out Escape from New York.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): As you reach out to people at a distance, your optimism about the future increases. A financial situation shows improvement. Do not waste time reveling in your good fortune. Redouble your efforts!

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Someone may be expecting too much of you. Speak up! Protect your position and reputation. Finish old projects rather than launching new ones. A change of residence sounds alluring. Check it out.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Quick thinking and a good head for business serve you well today. Record your creative ideas on paper and write important letters without further delay. Take a long look at your motivations.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Something that started out as opposition could boomerang in your favor. Be practical. Overcome a tendency to speak your mind without regard for the consequences.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Give your mate or partner more than one option or you could lose out completely. Profits come from utilizing skills you learned while moonlighting. Search for a misplaced item.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): News of a raise or promotion gives you cause for celebration. Adopt a positive attitude toward a difficult problem.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): A certain amount of confusion is likely. Postpone making major decisions until up-to-date information is available. Mend any differences you may have with your co-workers.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Do not let sentiment cloud your good judgment. Someone who formerly sympathized with you may do a complete turn-around. Go about your work as if nothing has happened. Eat sensibly and exercise.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Your standing at work improves, thanks to increased interaction with higher-ups. Out-of-town business events also assist you. Your social life slips into high gear.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): A partner's shaky decision could cause problems. Curb spending. An exercise workout will get the juices flowing tonight. It can be fun to pal around with co-workers if you avoid talking shop.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Opportunity is still knocking. A friend's offer of help gives you a much-needed boost. Mastering new skills will move you closer to a business goal. There is nothing to worry about.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Fulfill an obligation and you will then be free to play. Enjoy the positive changes stirring within you. Improved health and work habits will give you new energy.

fair," said Kelly Monahan, a junior rider. "At that moment you need the skill to read the horse correctly in order to compete well."

The riders run in different classes that range from beginning to novice jumping, intermediate jumping, walk, trot and canter, open equestrion on flat and advanced walk, trot and canter. Their skills range from jumping the horse, to "showing" it by walking and trotting.

"Our coach has pulled us together and given us lots of spirit," says Fandreyer. "Our team is finally coming together and it shows," Monahan said.

Cucciu said she is just as proud of her team as they are of her. "The team has the mental ability and skill to go on to nationals," said Cucciu. "They have the attitudes to read a horse correctly and look like they have been riding them for their entire lives."

Although a club sport, the team is competitive with 100 people trying out for approximately 20 spots every year. They practice once a week for four hours, besides meeting in the riding class and grueling competitions lasting from 6 a.m. to 5 p.m.

The team placed third overall at regionals with Susan Shallcross placing second in the region after a ride-off due to a tie for first place. Ramona Petrullo, Susan Shallcross, Andrea Wagner, Betty Adams and Kristy Matisko qualified for zones and will be competing in Greenfield at Stoneleigh Burnham on April 17 against Yale, Harvard and Cornell. After the zones competition, the team may go to nationals at Lake Erie College in Ohio.

men in this victory. Sprinters Lyonel Benjamin and John Johnson had big days winning the 100 and 200 meters respectively. Johnson also captured first place in the long jump, with a leap of 22 feet.

Scott Smith registered his most impressive performance to date placing first in both the discus and hammer throw.

"Scott Smith is a very hard working thrower," said O'Brien. "That was a very satisfying victory."

Tom Galligani and Paul Doyle kept their individual undefeated streaks in the triple jump and 100 meter high hurdles alive.

Other winners for UMass included Steve Paris (800 meters), Jim Avery (400) and Rick Copley (1500).

The team travels to Worcester this weekend to participate in the Holy Cross Classic invitational meet. Paul Doyle and Joe Kourafas will represent UMass in the decathlon during the first two days while the rest of the team will compete on Saturday.

"They've been amongst New England's leading decathletes," said O'Brien. He said he sees a top five finish for both of them as a real possibility.

At the Holy Cross Classic, athletes compete individualy as opposed to being scored as a team. Coach O'Brien's goal for the meet is to have as many as 10 individuals turn in performances that would qualify them for later championship meets.

again, and unfortunately she was in the number two spot in the order and it was too late for me to do anything about it."

The Flying Dutchwomen jumped out to an early 1-0 lead in the nightcap as leadoff batter Boyd took UMass starter Darlene Claffey's first offering and deposited it over the fence in left-centerfield. Boyd scored Hofstra's other run as well when she doubled to center in the third inning and scored on a single by Valerie Monaco.

The Minutewomen knocked on the door in the third inning, but had it shut by Hofstra starter Erin Phillips. Third baseman Laurie Dondarski lined a single to right to start the threat. After a sacrifice bunt by Dorsey that moved Dondarski to second, left fielder Stacey Nichols walked and Salisbury (replacing Powell) was hit in the foot to load the bases.

Claffey (4-5) pitched well enough for a win, scattering five hits over seven innings. Phillips (7-5) went the distance, surrendering four hits while striking out two.

Men's lacrosse opens with Delaware at home

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

After spending the first half of the season on the road, the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team will play its first home game of the season tomorrow at 1 p.m. against the University of Delaware.

As a result of poor field conditions at Garber Field so far this season, their initial home opener against Brown was cancelled (rescheduled for May 5) so they have played their first seven games on the road. Undoubtedly, home has never looked so good to the Gorillas.

"It's nice to come home finally," said coach Ted Garber. "The guys have been on the road for seven games and are ready to play on their home field."

When the Gorillas face off tomorrow at Garber field, the No. 19 Blue Hens (3-5) will be looking to avenge last season's 18-11 loss, in which All-American Mark Millon scored five goals. To do this, Delaware's top guns Anthony DiMarzo and John Wunder will have to have big days.

DiMarzo has compiled 30 assists on the year thus far, to go along with 14 goals. Wunder, with 28 goals, is the top goal scorer on the Blue Hen squad. Attackman Brad Glowaki has 17 points on the season, including 12 goals.

For UMass, Millon (33 goals, 13 assists) and Wes Depp (17 and 4) will lead the way on offense followed by Greg Kline (6 and 10), John Cavalerio (8 and 5) and Bill Edell (6 and 7). The defense will be anchored by goalies Tom LoPresti and Rip Correnti and face-off specialist Sam Joseph will be a key player as well.

"[The UMass/Delaware game] is a big rivalry," said Garber. "I'm looking forward to a very tough game. Hopefully we'll get a big crowd there to support us."

Lax Notes: A few errors which the Collegian regrets:

UNH did not beat Brown and will play them next Wednesday.

Mark Millon is currently fourth on the UMass career goals list with 130. Jim Weller holds the record with 162.

In the career points category, Millon has 178 total points (7th place) — Jeff Spooner in in first place with 275.

Women's lacrosse ready for RU in home opener

By ANDREW BRYCE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse team will play on its home field for the first time in three years as it hosts Rutgers on Saturday at 11 a.m. and Villanova on Sunday at 1 p.m., both at the lower Boyden fields.

The Minutewomen, 0-2 on the season, are playing in their first season since 1990. The team is in a rebuilding process as they are competing for the first time since the spring of 1990.

The Minutewomen have been defeated in their first two games, one at Boston College and the other at Dartmouth. However, despite the 0-2 record, interim coaches Bob Little and Karen Marley remain optimistic.

"By playing against teams like Dartmouth [ranked fourth in the nation], we are able to see where we need to get to," said Little. "After all, we're not judging ourselves on our success against these teams. We just want to improve each day."

Of the 26 women on the women's lax team, only three of them have previously competed on the collegiate level. Experience-wise, this means that they have three second-year players and twenty-three first-year players.

Little and Marley said they are pleased with the Minutewomen's progress so far this season, especially the individual play from the women that have never played on this level. They noted individual efforts from senior captain Racheal Splaine, defender Diana Clemente and senior Nancy Kane.

Goalie Donna Adametz has also received praise from the coaching staff. She is currently working with Ricky Mullins, co-captain of the men's lax team, to improve her skills.

"[Adametz] has a lot of goals scored on her, but she has played well," said Little. "She's been working hard and is learning fast."

To celebrate the return of women's lacrosse to the University, Saturday's game will feature pre-game festivities starting fifteen minutes before game time. Food and beverages will be available to all spectators.

Michael Hooker, president of the University of Massachusetts, Chancellor Richard O'Brien and athletic director Bob Marcum will be among those in attendance for the return of women's lacrosse tomorrow morning.

UMass swept by Dutchwomen

By SEAN P. HAYDEN
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts softball team continued its struggles yesterday when it dropped two straight games to Hofstra University's Flying Dutchwomen.

The Minutewomen, who lost the first game 3-0 and the second 2-0, fall to 7-14 for the year. Hofstra, the No. 1 ranked team in the region, upped its record to 15-8.

Offense was again the missing ingredient in the UMass arsenal as the Minutewomen couldn't cash in on their scoring opportunities.

In the first game, UMass looked like it was going to jump out to an early lead. They had runners at the corners in both the first and second innings, but were unable to push a run across Hofstra starter Stacy Jackson.

The Flying Dutchwomen got all the offense they would need in the fifth inning. Right fielder Kim Willard singled off of UMass starter Kelly Daut to lead off the inning, and eventually scored the game's first run on first baseman Melissa Bacigalupo's double. Bacigalupo was chased home by a Crystal Boyd single. Boyd tallied Hofstra's final run on a nicely executed double steal.

Daut (now 3-8 on the year) was impressive except for the rocky fifth inning. The sophomore gave up only four hits while striking out eight in her distance-going performance. Jackson upped her record to 7-3 with her complete game five-hit shutout.

Injury was added to insult for head coach Elaine Sortino, who saw two key contributors go down with injuries. Senior catcher Sherri Kuchinskas was forced to leave the game with what was thought to be a fractured middle finger on her throwing hand. The finger wasn't broken, however, and Kuchinskas later returned to action.

Freshman shortstop/right fielder Amy Powell also fell victim to the injury bug as she had to take a seat early in the second game due to an extremely sore left knee. Powell is expected to play this weekend.

"Amy had to come out," Sortino said. "Her leg swelled up

Baseball looks to break out of one year slump

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

As the University of Massachusetts baseball team heads to Morgantown, W. Va., for a three-game set with Atlantic 10 rival West Virginia, it will look to snap out of a five-game losing streak.

The Minutemen (7-13, 2-6 A-10) have had problems this season putting every facet of their game together. Whether it is pitching, hitting or fielding, head coach Mike Stone's team hasn't been able to get things going. If they do, it seems that the other team always shuts the door on any opportunity that UMass creates.

Earlier this season on March 19, UMass defeated the Mountaineers 5-4 in a closely-contested battle. The pitching staff of the Minutemen scattered five hits, allowing freshman left-hander David Dart to pick up the win.

West Virginia, despite being shut down by UMass at the plate in the last meeting, possesses heavyweights with the lumber, including the A-10 Player of the Week for April 6, shortstop Gerry Slavin.

Slavin, who is hitting .325, has seven doubles, two home runs and 14 RBIs. First baseman Mark Landers leads West Virginia in four areas: average (.424), doubles (11), HRs (five) and RBIs (34).

The Mountaineers are also loaded on the mound, despite losing Joe Hudson, who was drafted by the Boston Red Sox.

Senior left-hander Dan Barry (2-1, 3.50 earned run average) and junior left-hander Steve Kline (3-3, 2.61 ERA) are the key players for West Virginia, which is giving up just under five runs per game.

Kline was named A-10 Pitcher of the Week this past Monday for his four-hit masterpiece in a 3-0 shutout of Temple University.

Women's tennis team victorious

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team pitched a 9-0 shutout Wednesday afternoon against Springfield College. The Minutewomen were able to use 11 players in the victory against the outmanned SC squad.

UMass coach Judy Dixon said that she saw some positives in the victory against the Springfield team.

"One good thing was that [the UMass players] were not sloppy," said Dixon. "It was wonderful to see different players at the doubles spots come through and win."

In singles competition, the Minutewomen breezed by Springfield without dropping a set. Liesl Sitton continued her fine play at No. 1 singles by blasting Sarah Roberts 6-0, 6-1. Sitton is now 4-0 on the season at the No. 1 slot.

At No. 2 singles UMass' Stacey Scheckner did not encounter much difficulty either as she overwhelmed Shannon Smith 6-1, 6-0.

Pam Levine fought her way past Pam Smith at No. 3 singles, 7-6, 7-5. Dixon said Levine's victory was an important one.

"I think the big win was Pam's win," Dixon said. "She was down 4-0 in the second set, but her heart pulled her through. It was a psychological win, which are often the hardest ones to get."

At singles spots No. 4 - No. 6, the Minutewomen barely broke a sweat, losing only one game. At No. 4, Lesley Watts beat Carin Mollone 6-1, 6-0.

No. 5, Alissa Cohen, and No. 6, Kelly Grim, bageled their opponents 6-0, 6-0. Cohen and Grim remain undefeated on the year in singles play.

Dixon was able to experiment in the doubles section of play with three new combinations. At No. 1 doubles, Liesl Sitton teamed up with Mary Edwards defeat Springfield's Sarah Roberts and Shannon Smith 6-1, 4-6, 6-1.

Monika Schmidt and Amy Finn were victorious at No. 2 doubles as they pounced on Jen Oakes and Carin Mollone 6-1, 6-3. Rounding out the action at No. 3 doubles for the Minutewomen were Kathy Schmidt and Sherry Smith. Schmidt and Smith beat Springfield's Amy Venerus and Nicolle Galliete 6-2, 6-1.

"I think that they are up and are confident," said Dixon. "They are starting to feel like a team."

Men's track defeats Vermont

By MATT VAUTOUR
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's track team kicked it into high gear Wednesday afternoon as they rolled over the University of Vermont 89-60.

"The margin of victory surprised me," said coach Ken O'Brien. "I expected a 10 or 15-point win. This doubles that."

Twenty-three team members figured in the scoring for UMass, as the team captured first place in 10 of the 16 events.

"This was a pretty good illustration of our depth and balance," said a pleased O'Brien. "We're scoring points in almost equal bunches across the board."

This win, especially by such a a large margin of victory, goes a long way in boosting the confidence of the squad, O'Brien said.

"We gained momentum at the end of the indoor season. This win proves the maturity gained at the end of the indoor season wasn't lost," said O'Brien.

The top performers really stepped forward to contribute for the Minute-

Equestrian moves to regionals

By CATHERINE PULLEY
Collegian Correspondent

Great horses, new facilities and fresh coaching are only a few reasons why the University of Massachusetts Equestrian team has had a great season. Led by Wendy Cicciu as the new coach and Kelly Monahan, Heidi Seabeck and Susan Shellerosi as the captains, the team moved onto regionals with 11 qualifying riders.

Four riders have moved onto "zones," a highly competitive stage for the riders, by completing 35 points or more in a certain division.

Although unknown by most of the UMass campus, horseback riding is a very competitive and difficult sport. Mentally, in most sports, you need to get through to your coaches or teammates. But in the case of the Equestrian team, you need to mentally communicate with a horse.

"You can't force the horse to do anything," Felicitas Fandreyer, a senior rider, said. "Getting the communication down is a difficult process. Another thing that makes it harder, is that you don't practice with the same horse."

"When you go to a show at Mount Holyoke or Smith, you pick the horse you are going to ride out of a hat to make it

Fire destroys cult complex, few survive

By LAURA TOLLEY
Associated Press

WACO, Texas — Doomsday cult leader David Koresh's apocalyptic prediction for his followers came true Monday when a raging fire destroyed the compound where he had held federal agents at bay for 51 days.

As many as 87 members of the Branch Davidian religious sect, including Koresh and 25 children, are believed to have died in the flames, which raced through the wooden buildings in half an hour. Authorities said cult members set the fire themselves.

The blaze erupted about 12:05 p.m., just six hours after FBI agents began using armored vehicles to pound holes in the complex of buildings and spray them with tear gas in a bid to force an end to the standoff.

Eight cult members who escaped the flames are believed by federal officials to be the only survivors, but authorities said they would not know the precise death toll until they could search an underground maze of passageways.

Justice Department spokesman Carl Stern said two survivors were injured critically, one had a serious injury and three have minor injuries, all including burns. One person taken into custody told authorities that people inside the compound had set the blaze, Stern said.

"We can only assume it was a massive loss of life," FBI spokesman Bob Ricks said in a solemn afternoon news conference.

Ricks said multiple witnesses spotted cult members setting several fires.

One person, Ricks said, "was knelt down with his hands cupped, from which a fire erupted."

FBI agents reported seeing a man wearing a gas mask and black uniform throw something inside, following a fireball. Additionally, Ricks said, a man found Monday afternoon in a bunker on the grounds said lantern fuel had been spread throughout the wooden complex and that the fire was started simultaneously in several places.

Koresh had warned the FBI in a letter last week that agents would be "devoured by fire" if they tried to harm him.

A maze of tunnels was believed to run under the complex, but Jack Killorin, a spokesman in Washington for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, said the agency believed no tunnel system would have allowed people to survive the fire.

"It's a bad end and one of the ends we feared from the beginning," Killorin said. "Obviously, suicide was a concern all along, but the method was different, unexpected."

Police cut back presence

The reaction to king verdict in L.A. a peaceful one

By LINDA DEUTSCH
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES (AP) - Police scaled back a heightened street presence Monday and Rodney King's lawyer said his faith in the justice system was renewed after two policemen were convicted of violating King's civil rights.

Major crime was down about 25 percent during the weekend police alert.

"Los Angeles is not a war zone . . . not a city with people fighting each other and afraid of each other," Police Chief Willie Williams said in a television interview Monday.

"What the community found was that the additional officers were not a threat and we were able to build some relationships," he said later at police headquarters.

The 7,700-officer police department went on tactical alert Friday afternoon, putting thousands of additional officers on 12-hour shifts, when it was learned jurors had reached verdicts. Full deployment was ordered at dawn Saturday, shortly before the verdict, to avert possible rioting.

Last April, the acquittals of four white policemen on nearly all state assault charges in the videotaped beating of King, a black motorist, set off three days of rioting in which 54 people were killed.

There was no verdict-related crime over the weekend, said Lt. John Dunkin, and police canceled the emergency deployment. About 200 extra officers were to be on the streets for the next week, Williams said.

Hundreds of National Guard troops sent to armories began pulling out Sunday, and the Sheriff's Department went off 12-hour shifts and resumed normal operations.

The black community savored the convictions of Sgt. Stacey Koon and Officer Laurence Powell, said King's attorney, Milton Grimes.

"It does something to make one believe that the courts will deliver justice to African American people," Grimes said. "There is a renewed hope that justice will prevail in the courtroom."

The federal jury acquitted Officer Theodore Briseno and former rookie Officer Timothy Wind.

King was stopped in a Los Angeles suburb on March 3, 1991, after a high-speed chase, and a resident in a nearby apartment videotaped him being clubbed, kicked and shocked with a stun gun by police.

The beating raised a furor about police mistreatment of minorities.

King hasn't spoken publicly about the verdicts, but Grimes said he was gratified for the convictions and disappointed about the acquittals.

Marshall ends season perfectly

By ARTHUR STAPLETON

Perfect is defined as "flawless; lacking nothing essential."

No one was more perfect than Tammy Marshall last Saturday, as the senior ended her gymnastics career at the University of Massachusetts by scoring a perfect 10.00 on the floor exercise at the NCAA Nationals held at Oregon State University to capture the national championship.

To top off her championship weekend, Marshall received what she called "one of the biggest honors in women's collegiate gymnastics" when she was awarded the AAI-American Award, given to the top senior in the country. It was based on academics, athletics and community service, and was voted on by coaches across the country.

UMass head coach Alfie Mitchell said he nominated Marshall because of what she has done for the sport of gymnastics and for the University. He said the award was especially sweet because everyone always had tried to stack the odds against her, unsuccessfully.

"Initially, people said that Tammy wasn't going to be good anymore after she hurt her knee in high school. That was one strike against her," said Mitchell. "And then they said that she was never going to do what she really wants to do going to a school like Massachusetts.

"One thing about Tammy is that when she says she is going to do something, she is going to do it. One way or another, she'll get the job done."

When it came to the finals on Saturday, Marshall was the darling of the fans, according to Mitchell, as she won

General view of the Massachusetts Agricultural College, before 1885. In this view of a major part of the campus, three buildings dominate the scene.

Special to the Collegian

Editor's note: The following is the first in a four-part series of articles commemorating the 130th anniversary of the University.

On April 29, 1863 the Massachusetts Agricultural College, eventually to become UMass, was signed into existence. A certain congressman named Marshall P. Wilder had been fighting to make this happen for nearly 20 years.

Since 1845 he and his followers had been wrestling with the lazy state legislature, insisting that the only way Massachusetts agriculture could ever hope to compete with the massive plains of the West was through applied education, research and experimentation.

Countless Agricultural Institute committees had been formed and had collapsed without accomplishing anything. It probably never would have happened if not for a gift from the federal Congress.

In 1862, the Morrill Land Grant Act was signed by President Lincoln, setting aside land in each state for agricultural and mechanical institutes.

With the promise of free land, the state legislature no longer had any reason to delay. The land was divided between the young Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the new Massachusetts Agricultural College.

For the next four years, the college would only exist on paper. The first board of trustees, with Wilder as chairman, selected Henry Flagg French as the first president.

Together they all had the task of selecting a site for the college. About a dozen towns across Massachusetts were vying for the college's attention.

Wilder wanted the college to be located in Westboro. French insisted on Lexington. Governor Andrew Demanded that it should be a division of Harvard University.

The city of Springfield raised the necessary $75,000 for construction and the college was very nearly born there.

The first person to suggest Amherst was Levi Stockbridge, a Hadley farmer and former statesman. He was joined by William Smith Clark, a botany professor at Amherst College.

Together they vehemently petitioned in favor of Amherst as the ideal site. The decision was made in May of 1864, and a reluctant President French travelled to Amherst to meet with Clark and purchase the land.

The land was nothing but field and farmland. Five farmhouses were scattered across the original 310 acres purchase, two of which, the Stockbridge House and the relocated "Homestead" still exist as today's Faculty Club.

The original land that French and Clark purchased comprises what is now the central part of campus, stretching from Baker dormitory all the way to Route 116.

Now that a site had been chosen the trustees grappled with the task of construction. President French hired the famed architect Frederick Law Olmstead (who had designed New York's Central Park and the Boston Common.)

Olmstead and French wanted to model the college after a little country town with the students living in little cottages and the academic buildings resembling a town hall, church and library.

This little village would have been centered on the site of today's Franklin Dining Commons. The idea didn't fly with the trustees. Fed up with being rejected, French resigned in 1866.

He was replaced by Paul Chadbourne who worked with Stockbridge and Clark to come up with a more practical design for the college. Chadbourne's plan called for five buildings which were constructed in the summer of 1867.

Unfortunately none of the five original buildings exists today, although one of them nearly lasted into the 1970s.

The first was Old South College, a dormitory for 46 students, which was burned down in 1885 and was replaced by the existing South College.

Second was College Hall, a combined chapel, chemistry lab and drill hall, which was burned down in 1922. Its site is now occupied by Machmer Hall.

Third was the Boarding Club, a simple house where the students ate, located where today's Stockbridge Hall stands. It was torn apart and sold as lumber in 1906 soon after the construction of Draper Dining Commons.

Fourth came the Durfee Plant House, designed by William S. Clark and financed wealthy trustee Nathaniel Durfee. It lasted until 1953 when it was torn down and replaced by today's Durfee Conservatory.

Last of the original five was the Botanic Museum, it housed the President's office, labs, a classroom and the botany collection. It burned in 1969 and is now a parking lot near Stockbridge road and Chancellor's drive.

During the construction, Chadbourne was forced to resign due to ill health. Clark succeeded him and would be the first President to see students.

As the summer of 1867 waned and opening day advanced, Clark was hard pressed to come up with faculty. Clark himself would teach botany.

He chose Levi Stockbridge as instructor of agriculture. A colleague of Clark's from Amherst College, Ebenezer Snell agreed to teach mathematics for one year.

The final faculty member was young Henry Hill Goodell, a former student of Clark's who had graduated from Amherst in 1862. Goodell was a man of many talents and would teach English, French, German and the mandatory military drill courses.

With a total of five buildings and four faculty, the Massachusetts Agricultural College opened it doors on Oct. 2, 1867 to a class of about 50 male students.

'Extrava-Ganja' lights up crowd despite rainfall

By KENDRA WILLETT
Collegian Staff

Even a heavy downpour during the "Extrava-Ganja" Saturday failed to dampen the day-long celebration on the Amherst Town Common which almost 400 people attended.

The event, which was aimed at promoting the legalization of marijuana, was scheduled to include four live bands, several speakers from area organizations and vendors selling hemp-related and various other goods.

The rain forced the speakers to be cancelled, and the rest of the event was moved to the Student Union Ballroom.

Scheduled to speak during the event, Steven Levine, a member of the board of directors from MASS-CANN, a pro-legalization group, said he feels the United States is becoming less and less free.

"I'm not here today to be celebrating," Levine said. "I'm here to complain."

Approximately an hour and a half after the event, at the end of the first music set on the Amherst Common, the clouds rolled in, and a heavy downpour began. Most people attending "Extrava-Ganja" ran for cover, and the bands began packing up for the Student Union where "Extrava-Ganja" had planned for the rain.

UMass junior Aaron Wilson, vice-president of the Cannabis Reform Coalition and one of the event's planners, said he was discouraged by the weather, but realized the mud on the common required the bands be moved to the Student Union.

"We were doing really great until the rains came," Wilson said. "But the damage that could have been done to the common from all of the people and the mud would not have been worth it."

Kevin Simes, a UMass freshman who attended "Extrava-Ganja" while it was going on at the common said he was having a really good time until the rain started.

"It was really cool to be hanging out with people who shared the same views

Panel explores church views

Religious leaders discuss gay issues in their faiths

By JULIE OLSON
Collegian Staff

Religious perspectives on gay issues are struggling to move towards tolerance and acceptance, according to a panel discussion on Thursday night in the Campus Center.

The speakers were representatives from four different Amherst religious groups, who met to discuss "Once A Sin, Now What?", a panel on religion and gay issues.

Rabbi Sheila Weinberg of the Jewish Community of Amherst opened the discussion by saying that she felt the Jewish community was moving towards an attitude of acceptance and inclusion in regards to homosexuality.

Weinberg said that merely quoting scripture as a means to argue against homosexuality was ineffective.

"Torah and Jewish law is not stagnant, but alive, compassionate, and challenged to reinterpretation all the time," she said, adding that the Bible needed to be read in context and with a knowledge of the cultural audience to whom it was written.

"People have to understand that there will be a finite number of gays no matter what," said Weinberg.

She concluded her opening remarks by saying, "Who are we to declare what God has made an abomination?," adding that it was her desire to establish a Jewish community where everyone is welcome and respected.

Also on the panel was Rev. Bonnie Devlin, of the Unitarian Universalist Society of Amherst. Devlin discussed some of the attitudes she was trying to establish within her church, and talked about her experiences as a lesbian minister.

According to Devlin, Universal Unitarianism is founded on a combination of love, acceptance, and the worth and dignity of all people. The church has been active in promoting acceptance of homosexuality and has had an office for Gay and Lesbian Concerns since 1973.

Devlin outlined the church's history of anti-discrimination efforts over the past 20 years, which has included such actions as recognizing homosexual unions, calling for an end to anti-sodomy laws and formal withdrawal of support from any known discriminatory organizations.

"Talk is cheap," said Devlin. "The 'white male with a family' idea is hard to break."

She repeated the Unitarian Universalist's fundamental belief in the worth and dignity of the individual, and said that it is the knowledge that she would die for this belief that keeps her going.

Reverend J. Joseph Quigley, the soon-to-retire director of the Newman Center was on hand to present the Catholic perspective.

Quigley said that the Catholic Church views life on two levels, spiritual and physical. He added that the physical world is transitory and "luring" for humanity, who are "pilgrims" striving to get to heaven.

"Any appetite can get out of control," said Quigley. "I personally believe that man is omnisexual by nature. Humans can be aroused by either sex, or even by bestiality, but these appetites must be controlled by moral constraints."

Quigley said these moral constraints are formed by the establishment of social taboos, which provide guidelines for personal conduct.

"If there were no taboos, we could all be gay," said Quigley.

On the subject of homophobia within the Catholic Church, Quigley said, "We try to tackle it but we probably haven't done a good job yet. There are a lot of rednecks and blue collars who have fixed prejudices."

Rev. Quigley quoted Saint Thomas Aquinas, who wrote that the individual conscience must be respected above all. Quigley said the individual

This year's annual Holocaust Memorial Events at the University of Massachusetts will commemorate the suffering of Jews during the Holocaust and the plight of other oppressed groups of today's society.

These events take place within the last two weeks of April and are sponsored by Hillel Foundation in cooperation with the University and other campus groups.

The first of these host of events stretches from April 14 through the 23 and is called "About Face Forward," an exhibit of photographs and interviews with Holocaust survivors. UMass senior Seth Kaye presents his collection of photographs of life after the Holocaust in the Hillel House lounge.

On April 20 at 8 p.m. in the Hillel House lounge Lisa Lipkin will perform her personal stories of growing up as the daughter of a Holocaust survivor in "What Mother Never Told Me," reminiscences of a child of a Holocaust survivor.

Lipkin has taken her theatrical stories across the country and has appeared on numerous radio and T.V. shows, including CBS evening news in New York.

On April 21 at 11:15 a.m. in the Hillel conference room Poetry of the Holocaust will take place. The Hillel course on Israeli poetry will hold a special open-door public session on the poetry written about or during the Holo-

Students awarded annual scholarship

By ANN MARIE NEAL
Collegian Staff

Two students received the second annual Josephine White Eagle Scholarship Saturday. The two scholarship awards were presented to Kirsten Baldrige, a graduate student studying mental health counciling/education, and Sheena Brown, a sophomore education major, at the Josephine White Eagle Center which is located in Chadbourne Hall.

Baldrige and Brown were each presented with a $500 award because of their outstanding academic performances and community services.

"It was a hard decision to make. There were four deserving candidates but Kirsten and Sheena were both chosen because they were the reflections of Josephine and what she attempted to do," said Deirdre Almeita, the second Native American faculty member in the school of education. The first was Dr. Josephine White Eagle, who taught for one year at UMass before dying of cancer.

About 20 family and friends sat proudly as Baldrige and Brown each expressed their feelings about winning the award and what it felt like to be compared to Josephine White Eagle.

"I'm proud to be associated with having some of Josephine White Eagle's vision. I am also very honored to be sharing this award with Sheena," Baldrige said.

Brown was joined by her Jamaican mother and Native American father, who arrived from Rhode Island. Brown said, "I'm proud to receive this award and to have my parents here. I hope I can continue to serve the community."

the community and CCEBMS for being supportive and for taking the time to properly interview and evaluate them. They also expressed the need for more active student participation and involvement within the community, as well as the need to give many of the students the recognition they deserve.

Sonia Nieto, a faculty member in the school of education and chair of the Scholarship Committee made the closing remarks.

"I hope this scholarship will continue to exist because it is very important. I also hope that more students will apply. It is open to everyone," Nieto said.

According to department members, the scholarship is based on donations and fund raising. Nieto urged people to make small or large appeals and donations to the scholarship.

Conflict in Yugoslavia examined

Horrors of war-torn Bosnia are a topic for experts

By BRIAN C. O'NEILL
Collegian Staff

Three experts on the former Yugoslavia gave their accounts of current atrocities in the region and told of possible solutions to the war, during the second part of the teach-in series "Bosnia Under Siege" last week.

"The White House decided we weren't going to get involved because we didn't want kids in body bags," said George Kenney, the traveling consultant for the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace and a former United States-Yugoslavian policy expert for the State Department.

Kenney felt that the United States government ruled out intervention without thinking about the whole crisis in terms of policy.

Feryal Gharahi, vice president of Equality N.O.W., and Katerina Dervisevic, a photo-journalist who has been on assignment in Yugoslavia for the Christian Science Monitor, also spoke at the teach-in.

Kenney said the problem in Yugoslavia does not involve intrinsically evil people, but people responding to different social incentives that the Yugoslavian government has created. He said he blames the leader, Slobodan Milosevic for the changes.

"With good social conditions you get good behavior and the reverse," Kenney said.

Kenney said the United States does have social and strategic stakes in Yugoslavia. However, he said, intervention is necessary.

"The United States needs to stop Serbia from carving out a war of agression on its neighbors," Kenney said.

Gharahi spoke about her trip to Bosnia last February, when she met with several victims of the rape camps. She told stories of women being raped, men being raped and forced incest.

"In 1938 the war's reaction was apathy and silence; in 1993 it is the same," Gharahi said.

Dervisevic gave a slide show of some of the sights she saw in Bosnia. She showed photos of central European villages that have been destroyed, echoing the horrors of World War II.

Verdict a small victory

It came a year too late and it's only a small step in the right direction. But the conviction of two Los Angeles police officers in the beating of Rodney King is a victory, nonetheless.

It was announced Saturday morning that the jury in the King civil rights case had found officers Stacey Koon and Laurence Powell used undue force against King and were guilty of violating his civil rights.

The four officers, who are White, were videotaped by a witness beating King, who is Black, with police clubs in 1991. The case quickly became one of the most controversial in American history, especially after the acquittals last May resulted in riots.

The other two officers in the case were acquitted Saturday. However, while they share the guilt in the beating of King, the evidence suggested Powell and Koon bore much of the responsibility. They used the most force. They were the senior officers present.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is glad that some measure of justice was finally served in this tragic case. Still, it is alarming that it took a year, two trials and the frightening images of Los Angeles engulfed in flames for the judicial system to figure out that King's civil rights were violated.

More importantly, this story isn't over yet. Powell and Koon still await sentencing. Los Angeles still hasn't recovered from last May's riots. America is still a society where social and economic justice is something to be hoped for, not guaranteed.

As events on this campus during the past year have plainly and painfully showed, our society has a long way to go before its racial divisions are healed and social justice is something we can take for granted. These latest convictions are only a start.

Saturday's King decision, while welcome, is no cause for us to pat ourselves on the back. The riots forced America to look at itself with a critical eye and realize its shortcomings. We would be foolish to forget about them just because two police officers were convicted.

Racism goes beyond L.A.

David RIVERA

The verdict: guilty. America can breathe again — or can it? If any good can come from the King case, I would hope that this country would look at the larger problem that tears at society every day.

Racism, like that used against Rodney King, is inherent in all parts of our society. If you don't believe me, just ask Amherst resident Doris Cruz.

As a young girl she had moved to the United States from Corozal, Puerto Rico. She just wanted a better life, and she knew the States could offer that. What she didn't know was the hate it also offered. "We lived in the Bronx," Cruz said. "Those were the worst two years of my life but my school was great, so I looked forward every day to just going to school and learning."

Cruz would use that ideal to further her education. She got her bachelor of arts degree from UMass, and her masters degree in education from Smith College. She had come a long way with a lot of hard work.

In 1988 she was elected to the Amherst school committee. She thought she was more than qualified; so did the voters. Like many people she thought Amherst was different, special. This year she learned otherwise.

This past December Cruz decided to run for the Select Board. She wanted to take some of her positive ideas that won her praise on the school committee and try to do some good for the town.

"The campaign started out normal," Cruz said. "My campaign wasn't that different from my opponents, but then as [the campaign] went on then — it started."

Racial slurs were painted on her campaign posters. She didn't think much of it, but then it happened again and again. "No other candidate had their signs destroyed," Cruz said. "Mine were selected because I'm Hispanic."

The signs weren't knocked over — if they were they wouldn't be able to carry their hateful messages. They were covered with words like "spic" and some were slashed with a razor. Doris had grown up living with this kind of ignorance, she went on with her campaign.

"People not of color don't understand the acts of racism that people of color go through daily," Cruz said. "It's something you deal with constantly."

But then the letter came. "We do not support spics or niggers," it read. It even had a swastika on it.

Unlike her opponents, Cruz had to deal with running a campaign and worry about her safety. She filed a report with the district attorney, but they couldn't do much. It was an anonymous letter.

At the end of the campaign, though expected to do well, Cruz didn't get a seat on the board. She may have even been glad; she wouldn't have to deal with more attacks.

But then the phone call came.

"If you like your family, you won't seek chairmanship of the school committee," the voice said.

"I just lost control," Cruz said. "I couldn't function, I cried for four days."

Now her family was being threatened. Cruz, with the support of her friends, family and fellow school committee members, sought the chairmanship nonetheless and won.

She thought she had done everything right. She went to school, started a career, raised a family and helped her community. But in the end none of this mattered. All that mattered was her race, not her character.

Doris Cruz's case is just one example of all the unrecorded injustices that take place everyday in this country. Most are made up of people engaged in the silent struggle for acceptance as an equal, and that silent struggle — just to simply live.

Amherst isn't that far from Los Angeles after all.

Graphic Spanish film is a necessary reminder

The movies required for Intermediate Spanish II, in keeping with the goal of the course to explore "cultural and literary themes stressing modern Spanish and Spanish American civilization," portray aspects of life that might not be familiar to all Americans. While that's a good thing, the downside is that so far the movies have been so depressing that not even those cheerful people from the language tapes could maintain a positive outlook on life. Still, for all the death and abuse, they are good movies.

The latest one, La Historia Officiale or The Offical Story, is about a woman in Argentina discovering the horrors of a military dictatorship which, until then, she had been able to ignore. None of the main characters die in this film. It is still disturbing, however, because the film's climax is a graphic scene of a husband abusing his wife. If you make out all the words, you will realize that this man, who works for the government, is not just terrorizing his wife but torturing her with whatever home fixtures he has at hand to make her tell him where their daughter is.

If the gasps of the audience woke you up, you might not catch this commentary on the brutal extremes of political power, seeing only a graphic display of domestic violence. Even so, with the University's current sensitivity to domestic violence because of the senseless killing of a UMass student this semester, the film seems more important, more relevant to our lives. By touching on an issue made too real by recent tragedy, the film might dig too deep, especially for those who knew Tara Hartnett. But it is an issue that needs to be dug at; we need to better understand the reality of domestic violence and its presence in our culture. The discussion in class regarding the film may have lacked in structure, but the professor made an effort to ensure the students did understand its relevance, going so far as to bring in a recent article from a local newspaper.

To make a sweeping generalization, we as a culture seem to need graphic reminders of those problems that aren't suited for "polite conversation." We seem to need to pick off scabs to realize the spreading infection underneath. Perhaps this is why the Spanish department has chosen films with such graphic violence and depressing endings. Perhaps not, but either way the messages are valuable.

It's time to talk

I was pleased to hear the verdict in the federal trial of the police officers accused of beating Rodney King. Although we will now wait for the sentencing in August, it is a relief to know that long and careful jury deliberations substantiate some of what I feel every time I see the videotape.

While we wait and hope for fair and just sentences, we can focus on our own campus with renewed energy. As a community we will take the time to talk through some of the issues and concerns, such as those about the integrity of the judicial system and the increasing violence in our society, raised by this trial and other events.

Thief spoils Durfee Conservatory for everyone

There is a treasure on campus called Durfee Conservatory. Beloved by many, it contains a remarkable collection of beautiful and exotic tropical plants. For over 126 years it has enriched UMass history.

In the past, Durfee was a place of great interest to the student body. Now many students pass the greenhouse by the Health Services, never taking the time to enter. Some students have found our treasure. Unfortunately, some have been thieves and vandals. Graffiti has crept onto our walls, the creative inspirations of student "taggers." But much worse are theft and destruction. Rocks thrown through our windows not only cause broken glass damage, but heat escapes from the greenhouse killing plants that cannot be replaced.

Recently four Bonsai plants of great value were stolen. The beauty they gave to visitors is irreplaceable. Durfee is one of a kind with its rare and aged plants and is open and free to the public. When a thief steals from Durfee, he steals from all of us.

Durfee is your place, a place of unquestionable beauty, a place to relax. UMass students should not behave in any way to desecrate this defenseless sanctuary. Please help protect Durfee. Visit the Durfee Conservatory 8 a.m. to 4 p.m., Monday and Friday. See for yourself.

O'Brien's thoughts on L.A., campus

It was with a sense of relief that I heard the verdict in the federal trial of the officers charged in the beating of Rodney King. It was agonizing to relive the details of the beating and agonizing to wait for the jury's decision. This verdict stands in contrast to that of last year's and will help to restore faith that the judicial system can support the constitutional rights of citizens of this country. While I know many had hoped for a unanimous guilty verdict I hope that we can all respect this verdict and share my renewed confidence in the judicial system.

The streets in L.A. are quiet, but people are gathering to talk about the trial, its impact on them, their concerns about the sentencing in August and their hopes and needs for the future. On this campus too, we need to reflect on these issues and concerns. Opportunities for students, faculty, and staff to discuss these and many related topics will be announced throughout the next several weeks.

Far away events such as these make us pause to consider the climate on our own campus and to make sure we are moving toward our goal of being a socially just and multicultural campus. I have endeavored this year to provide regular updates on actions taken by the administration.

One piece of good news that has not yet been announced is the fact that eight new faculty of color have signed contracts to teach at this campus. These commitments put us well ahead of schedule in meeting the promise made a year ago to hire ten additional faculty of color by 1995. We may, in fact, do even better this year as three other contracts have been offered, but not yet accepted.

I have been heartened by the fact that students, faculty and administrators have been talking seriously about issues and addressing concerns before they reach crisis proportions. I believe this is a positive step that contributes significantly to improving our campus climate. I appreciate the time and effort many of you have put toward resolving issues and look forward to continuing the good work we have begun together.

conscience of the informed, responsible person is "supreme."

Reverend Bob Livingston, from the First Congregational Church, United Church of Christ in Amherst, explained how his church operates on a democratic system in which the local church is the highest authority.

He said that although there was a call in 1985 for the various branches of the United Church of Christ to accept gays and lesbian, "very few did."

Livingston reinforced what Rabbi Weinberg and Rev. Devlin said about the need to read scripture intelligently before using it as a way to condemn homosexuality, saying, "scripture is inconsistent."

He closed his comments for the evening by quoting Karen Lebacqz, a United Church of Christ theologian, saying, "What God does regard as a sin is oppression, injustice, persecution, disrespect for persons. This sin then is homophobia, gay-bashing, discriminatory legislation."

Third World Affairs

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers or cartoonists and do not necessarily reflect those of the Collegian unless otherwise noted.

An alternative to the rule

In today's world, countries are grouped into three categories: modern-industrial nations, pre-industrial nations, or Third World nations, far from achieving economic and political prosperity.

One of the most important questions facing our world today, in this so-called "post-cold war," is how a Third World nation turns into an industrially and politically sound country, able to support its citizens with a good job, effective educational system, and a comfortable standard of living?

The United States, a defender of free-market economies, and supposed winner of the ideological battle waged between Capitalism and Marxism, advocates laissez-faire economics and democratically elected governments for the former Communist countries, as well as the Third World nations of Latin America and Africa so that they too can achieve the American way of life. Why not? What nation wouldn't love to have a McDonald's or Taco Bell at every corner and a television set that can pick up some fifty or more channels? Come on, that's the American way.

Christopher
ROGERS

I propose that the Third World countries with a predominantly Catholic population should not turn to the United States as the "only" solution to their problems, from escaping triple-digit inflation, government corruption, and a society of haves and have-nots, but rather, should try to improve themselves from within.

One way this can happen is through the local Churches of the poorest countries, and even those making progress, such as Chile, which is adopting the theories of Gustavo Gutierrez and Liberation Theology.

Liberation Theology is an interpretation of Christian faith, based on the experience of the poor and concentrates on lifting those less fortunate out of poverty by looking to the Catholic Church not as a hierarchical organization, but as an entity willing to aid its followers in improving the local schools, medical facilities, and making political participation more open and equal for everyone.

After all, in most of the Western hemisphere the Catholic Church is one of the most powerful and wealthier organizations in existence today. Liberation Theology proposes that the Church's power and wealth be used to aid the proletariat in making a better life for themselves, by learning how to read and write, eventually improving the quality of life.

Unfortunately, the Vatican under John Paul II, Pope since 1978, has not been very conducive to Gutierrez's ideologies and prefers to have the church remain quite authoritarian in its dealing with Bishops and Cardinals around the world, and whom it appoints for those lofty positions.

The main reason why the Vatican, under the present Pope, has tried to limit the practice of Liberation Theology, its power and message, is easy to understand. Many see the Peruvian Gutierrez and his beliefs as having more in common with Marxism/Leninism than any other ideology. And the Pope, being Polish and a fervent opponent of the former Soviet Communism which occupied his country for fifty years, won't easily allow Liberation Theology to proliferate too much, regardless of the positive outcome if adopted enthusiastically by the Vatican.

Unfortunately, this is another example of how the cold war, supposedly pitting the United States versus the former Soviet Union, somehow interfered and negatively affected other parts of the world.

Now that the Cold War is over, and the former Soviet Union no longer occupies Poland, some hope emerges that John Paul II embraces Liberation Theology, and that in a few generations, some of the Third World countries can enjoy the same kind of prosperity that the U.S. does, but achieve it through different means. Perhaps the sooner these developing countries become economically more stable, the sooner they too will be able to watch "Cheers" re-runs five times a day.

Armenia hopes for peace

Think back for a moment, and remember the latest snow storm that "crippled" the Northeast, and how it stripped the streets of people or activity of any kind. Then, consider how it might have been, if the scene had lasted all winter. Then imagine what it might be like if you turned off the heat and electricity in your house for a while, say a month or two, and stopped shopping for the duration. Add a half dozen starving people living in your apartment, and you might begin to understand how it feels to live in Armenia today.

As the world sits by, time is running out for Armenia. The ongoing blockade imposed by the neighboring republic of Azerbaijan, has left the streets of the capital city of Yerevan nearly barren, a result of the near total absence of fuel of and the consequential lack of heat or electricity throughout the republic.

Peter H.
NERSESIAN

Even worse, however, is the resulting food shortage, leaving the great majority of the population subsisting on sub-human rations. At current rates, which are steadily on the rise, the winter is expected to leave 30,000 dead of malnutrition and disease. This small nation of 3.5 million, which was only a few years ago known for one of the highest standards of living in the former Soviet Union, now stands at the brink of catastrophe.

The crisis in Armenia stems out of its five-year-old conflict with the Azerbaijan over the territory of Nagorno-Karabagh, a region mainly populated by Armenians, yet still held within the borders of Azerbaijan. Last year, the region declared its independence from Azerbaijan, resulting in the latest round of fighting which culminated in January's destruction of the last natural gas pipeline into Armenia.

Since then, the country has been in a state of emergency. Schools have been closed until spring. All but six out of 400 manufacturing plants stand idle, and employment rates are just over ten percent.

The landscape stands ravaged as trees are stripped of their limbs to provide firewood, leaving bare stalks reaching toward the sky as eerie reminders of the constant ordeal. Streets are roamed by packs of abandoned dogs, themselves crazed with hunger, that harass passersby in hopes of a meal.

And morgues are literally overflowing with the dead whose relatives cannot afford to give them a proper burial.

Even as the situation worsens, however, response from the world community has been sporadic at best. In a time when international attention is focused on conflict elsewhere in the world, the plight of Armenia has claimed little of the public eye. The focus of the U.S. and the United Nations actions has been mainly centered on Somalia and the Balkans, while some aide has been attempted, much of it has, again, been stopped by the blockade.

"The entire world is watching with its arms folded," said parliamentary deputy Khachik Stambultsyan in a recent Time magazine interview, "while we die of cold and hunger."

A recent U.S. House of Representatives resolution was introduced to condemn the blockade by Azerbaijan and actions supporting it by the republic of Turkey, in addition to providing humanitarian relief to the beleaguered Armenian republic, but action has been slow.

Russia has been reluctant to involve itself over fears of alienating its own minority of people who, like the Azerbaijanis, are Muslim. And without the weight of a major outside power, the odds appear to disadvantage Armenia, whose people are outnumbered by two to one by those of Azerbaijan.

The Armenian people are no stranger to prolonged adversity. The attempted genocide by Turkey during the first world war left over a million of the Armenian population dead, while scattering most of the survivors. Only approximately four years ago, much of the country was devastated due to an earthquake which killed over 25,000, and whose damage lies largely unrepaired today as a result of the blockade.

But at the moment, hope seems to be ticking away for the Armenian people as they search for their historic will to survive. "At this point we are just living to keep our pulses going," says Armenian physician Ara Asoyan. In the words of the former Armenian foreign minister Raffi Hovannisian, as quoted in Time, "This is not the first difficult, cold winter for Armenians, but there is an unfortunate sense among the people that they have been abandoned to their fate."

Peter H. Nersesian is a UMass student.

African-Americans' role in the Third World Revolution

Of the nearly one billion Black people living in this world, over ninety-five percent live in the Third World. The Third World is defined as developing nations that have been exploited by Europeans during colonial rule to provide the resources for the development of the West.

Today Africa has become the last great bastion of colonial rule. The continent was first carved up by the European nations during the Berlin Conference of 1884. This political landscape was radically transformed in 1957 when Kwame Nkruma of the British Colony Gold Coast led his country in a revolution to become the first Black Nation in Africa to liberate itself from colonial rule. During the next two decades, one colony after another gained its independence ending with the independence of Zimbabwe from Britain in 1980.

Martin
JONES

Today, Africa's independence is being blocked by the White minority government of the Republic of South Africa. South Africa is not considered a Third World Nation by economic or technological standards. It has become developed because the wealth of the nation was retained for its own internal development. The gold and diamond resources have turned South Africa into a major economic honey pot, attracting U.S. and foreign investors like bees to set up commercial enterprise there. The favorable climate and rich farmland has also attracted a permanent European settlement. The colonizer and colony exist on the same land, separated by a political system called apartheid.

This is why Chris Hani, head of the South African Communist Party was killed. This is why economic sanctions against South Africa were lifted despite the absence of true democratic reforms. This is the latest battle in the 500 year war between the colonial governments of the West, and the people of color living in the Third World. It is an economic war over resources and capital, with racial politics being utilized as a primary weapon.

And what about the remaining 5 percent of Blacks who are fortunate enough to live in the world's sole remaing economic and military superpower? What do you have to say about Haiti, Somalia, and South Africa?

Malcolm X realized the power of Black Americans making a connection with the Third World. During his last years on this earth he began to build coalitions with African heads of state to use their power with the United Nations fight for justice for the Africans trapped in America. And most recently, the second Rodney King trial has been used to falsely propagate that the system actually works in our favor.

Our struggle is a global struggle for survival. It goes far beyond South Central L.A. Blacks in America must never cease to utilize their power to liberate their "brothers and sisters" in Africa and Latin America. Until then, there will be neither "justice" nor "peace."

Wheelchair division records set

By JON MARCUS
Associated Press

BOSTON - Jim Knaub won the Boston Marathon wheelchair division for the fifth time Monday, shattering the course record and world-best time by more than four minutes.

It was the sixth consecutive year that a new world best-time has been set by wheelchair competitions in Boston.

"There's nothing like the crowd of people in Boston," Knaub said after finishing the 26.2 mile course in 1:22:17, well under his previous mark set last year, 1:26:26. "You're just floating on this wave of applause and people screaming and yelling."

Three-time defending champion Jean Driscoll won the women's wheelchair division in 1:34:50, topping the previous world best of 1:36:52 set by her last year.

"I can't believe I did it again," Driscoll said. "It gets better every year."

The top six men and first- and second-place women all broke the previous world best times in their divisions. They credited a tail wind and advances in wheelchair technology.

Knaub hit a top speed Monday of 38 mph in his chair, which he started using just a week ago. Driscoll topped 34 mph.

Knaub, 37, of Long Beach, Calif., said he was accustomed to the heat that slowed some able-bodied racers Monday.

"The heat and the tail winds were much better for the wheelchairs than for the runners," he said.

A former nationally ranked pole vault competitor who was disabled in an accident, Knaub also won the Boston race in 1982, 1983 and 1991. Along with Boston, he also won at Long Beach, San Francisco and Los Angeles marathons last year.

Driscoll, 26, of Champaign, Ill., won the Boston Marathon in 1990, her first attempt. She broke her own world best last year by almost six minutes, finishing just 10 minutes behind Knaub.

Knaub was chased by a field of 73 other men and eight women wheelchair competitors race organizers called the strongest ever. Among the entrants were four other former winners.

"I kept looking to see if I could see anybody," Knaub said. "The hardest thing was to keep focused."

Boiling Point fizzles Sandlot steals home

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

It's never a surprise when a film doesn't perform to expectations and always a treat when a movie exceeds anticipations. Such is the case with this week's new releases, a mixed bag where proven talent falls flat and a seemingly tired storyline gets a fresh treatment.

First, the bad news. Wesley Snipes walks through Boiling Point with a dazed expression on his face. I shared his apparent puzzlement. With a title like Boiling Point, you'd think it would be an action-packed cop thriller, with big explosions and unrelenting fire power. Unfortunately, Point sputters until it comes to a dead halt . . . about five minutes into the film. Point plays like an updated "Dragnet" episode; boring beyond belief and almost as exciting as a piece of cardboard.

Let's hope Boiling Point goes straight to video oblivion where it can act as a sedative for video-renting insomniacs.

Boiling Point is adapted from Gerald Petievich's novel Money Men and involves itself with a federal agent (Snipes) whose partner is killed by two thugs (Dennis Hopper and Viggo Moretensen). Naturally, Snipes vows vengeance (very original) and has a week to do it.

What follows is tedious double-crossing and cop movie cliches, all involving counterfeit money. Whew, hold on to your seats, folks. Snipes has the appropriate emotional baggage (ex-wife and son) and is now dating a hooker played by Lolita Davidovich (Raising Cain). Zzzzzz. Boiling Point is both confusing and uninteresting, traits that don't sit well with audiences or critics.

The actors, specifically Snipes and Hopper, are surprisingly dull. Snipes, who dazzled us in Jungle Fever, recites the processed dialogue like he's reading the menu at Friendly's. Hopper talks with his hands a lot in this movie, but it's all in vain, he's just plain booooring. There's nothing sadder than watching good actors trapped in subpar material.

If you're awake by the end of Boiling Point, you may just give a care about what happens. Let's hope for all concerned, Point goes straight to video oblivion where it can fulfill it's only purpose — as a sedative for video-renting insomniacs.

And now the good news: Sandlot is a charming kid's movie that for once didn't seem like it was made for idiots. Although it brought back painful childhood baseball memories for me (I was so bad, I missed baseballs off the tee), it kept me blissfully entertained for a few hours and after sludging through Boiling Point, I needed it.

There's nothing new in Sandlot, it's coming of age story is hardly original, but it's the way that it repackages its cliches into a pleasing and watchable confection.

Sandlot tells of the new kid in a typical 60s town, Scotty Smalls (Tom Guiry) whose stepdad (played by Denis Leary) doesn't have time to show him how to play baseball. He runs into a local gang of boys who play ball in the sandlot. Scotty has a disastrous first day, but after the group leader Benny Rodriguez (Mike Vitar) gives him some pointers and he catches a fly ball, he's welcomed in the gang.

But when Scotty's prized autographed Babe Ruth baseball gets hit over the fence into the yard of a big, fearsome dog nicknamed the "beast," the group has to work together (as a team, get it?) and retrieve the ball.

Sandlot has a breezy, easygoing pace that is amusing for both kids and adults, capturing a time period that is pure innocence. There are, thank God, no Big Questions to figure out because Sandlot cleverly works its 'teamwork' messages in between the fun.

There were some scenes that sent me groaning — one where the kids play ball while fireworks burst in the background screamed cliche. However, the engaging and believable acting made up for occasional lapses into corny territory, proving that Macaulay Culkin should start to worry. Enjoy this fun movie before the summer blockbusters take over the multiplex. Boiling Point: D- Sandlot: B

Choirs inspire crowd

King's work celebrated with song

Holy Temple Church of God Mass Choir
Amherst College Choir
Student Union Ballroom
April 15

"It's Mighty Nice to be on the Lord's Side" sang the Holy Temple Church of God Mass Choir to a packed Student Union Ballroom this past Thursday night. While commemorating Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s life and work, people of all walks of life came together, cheered, sang and danced to three area gospel choirs.

To start off the program, UMass student, Pascale Martineau gave a tremendous a cappella version of "Lift Every Voice and Sing," the black national anthem. If this was any indication of what the rest of the night was going to be like, the audience was going to be in for an evening of beautiful music and faces.

The BSU gospel choir, directed by Natasha Springer, warmed up the crowd with singing, "Can't Nobody Do Me Like Jesus" and "Love Said Not So," a BeBe and CeCe Winans hit. Springer and the choir surprised many with their impressive voices.

Martineau and Michelle Scott's duet of Winan's song was very moving. At one point people were cheering Martineau on when she took the song over with her strong voice.

By the time the Holy Temple Choir reached the stage, and filled it to capacity, the crowd was ready for some more. This choir brought the ballroom to it's feet with their beautiful voices and great music.

What topped this groups performance were two little fireballs in the front row. For those who missed the performance, the choir ranged from small children to adults. But, what caught a lot of attention were two little girls, who couldn't have been more than four, singing and praising God just like everyone else.

The Amherst College Choir, directed by George Williams, had a tough act to follow. Coming on after the Temple Choir, Amherst held their own singing a powerful rendition of "When the Saints Come Marching In."

In between the musical groups, Professors Joy James, of the Women Studies Department, and Helene Page, of the Anthropology Department, discussed the life and works of King.

Page pointed out that King and Malcolm X had an intimate connection, but the media painted them at odds with each other, she said.

These people represented what W.E.B. DuBois called a 'double conscience,'" explained Page, "Being an American and being an African."

James discussed the fact that it's "easier to remember the man as a symbol than what he stood for and his brutal death."

For those who didn't have the chance to go to this performance, you missed a powerful evening of seeing people coming together, clapping, singing and rejoicing while helping to remember one of the great leaders of our time.

"Liesl is always hustling and her quickness and work ethic is great," Dixon said. "She is good and a big thing is that she wants to get better."

Rounding out the singles mix for UMass is captain Pam Levine, who battled for her first singles victory in her last match (vs. Springfield), Lesley Watts and Stacey Scheckner.

UMass doubles department has been a department of marked improvement as the season has moved on. In UMass' last two matches its doubles teams have gone undefeated at 6-0.

Coming into the year, Dixon and her team had a goal: to go 3-3 in their initial season back. Dixon said that she hopes her team can improve on that.

"Right now we are 3-1, I would like for us to get better than 3-3," Dixon said. "I hope we can pull out at least one of these two matches."

provided all the offense UMass would need, with a fifth inning two-run homer.

Game two, witnessed more drooling from UMass' "Murderer's Row" as the Minutewomen got bat action from Jennifer Raworth (2-for-4, with one run scored), Kuchinskas (3-for-4, with two runs scored) and Rachel Lawson (4-for-4, two runs scored, and two RBI). Meanwhile, Claffey picked up where Daut left off, giving up just three hits on seven innings work, while giving up no earned runs.

Overall, to pick one star of the weekend one would have to look at Kuchinskas who batted 10-15 in the four game stretch and improved her average to a whopping .451.

"I've been seeing the ball extremely well," said the senior catcher. "I think being here for four years has helped me out a lot."

When asked about todays matchup with Central Connecticut, the Minutewomen remained confident, but always precautious.

"We'll have to play well against them," said Claffey, "and good for the rest of the season."

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Take a long-range view when deciding where to focus your efforts next. Your reputation precedes you. To get the best results, avoid shortcuts. Listen carefully to what a friend says tonight.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Let this day go by without saying "yes" or "no" to any binding suggestions. You need more time to talk things over. Buy with greater caution when attending store sales.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Go on the offensive if you know that you have strong support from all sides. Token opposition gives way. Do not let a workaholic streak snuff out your chances for domestic happiness.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): An unexpected loss may run in the higher figures. It would be wise to follow the official line right now. The love boat docks for repairs tonight. Let diplomacy reign!

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Remain in contact with those who know the score. Key associates are still dependable. Reject an offer that sounds too tempting. Refuse to succumb to the pressure applied by a fast talker.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): The financial outlook is favorable. Talks and travel link you to good buys. Be satisfied with knowing your true worth. A new romance could receive a big boost tonight. Go slow.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Business dealings are favored. A financial partnership could fall neatly into place today. You forge a strong bond built on ideas and trust. Call a family member and say "I love you."

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): An assertive push will advance your plans quite nicely. Recently acquired information gives you new power and financial leverage.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Listen attentively to what everyone has to say. Later, you can make up your own mind. Ignoring a work rule or legal regulation could cost you dearly.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Swapping ideas will be beneficial to both sides. There may be some facts you would prefer to keep to yourself. Show your usual good judgment. A friend is instrumental in guiding your footsteps.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): The emphasis now is on becoming more efficient. Business demands grow, but your are up to the challenge. Actions speak louder than words when trying to repair a rocky romance.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): A business is not all that its sponsors claim. Read between the lines of a contract. High energy lets you deal handily with any problems that come your way.

them over as soon as the music of her floor exercise began.

"The crowd there was amazing," said Marshall. "The athletic director from Oregon State came over to me and asked `well, how does it feel being an outsider and somehow getting all of the fans to support you?'

"As soon as my music started, they were clapping the whole time. It was so exciting I wanted to jump up and down and stop [the routine]."

Marshall's championship routine ended with the fans holding "10" signs in unison. When the score went up, Marshall said she burst into tears. Georgia's Heather Stepp and Oregon State's Amy Durham shared the title by scoring a 10.00 as well.

The entire meet began last Thursday night with the preliminary competition, which is used to determine both the finalists for each individual event and the all-around championship.

Marshall finished sixth in the all-around with a school record of 39.250, her best performance at any national meet. She received a 9.675 on beam and a 9.925 on floor.

On vault, she received a 9.85, but was one of the eleven alternates that were unable to reach the finals. According to both Marshall and Mitchell, it was expected that the University of Alabama would scratch former U.S. Olympian Kim Kelly from the finals, allowing all eleven alternates to compete.

However, Kelly was not scratched until five minutes before vaulting began, leaving both Marshall and Kristen Kenoyer of Utah, who shared last year's vault championship, out of the finals.

Marshall's productive weekend also yielded her career best on bars, 9.80. She said that it meant a lot to her because she hit the more difficult tricks that were added to the routine for national competition.

For her efforts this past weekend, Marshall was named first team All-American (all-around and floor) and was invited to the tryouts for the World University Games.

The meet marked the first and last time that Marshall and her sister Wendy, a freshman at the University of Michigan, will compete together. The younger Marshall scored a 9.80 on vault as well.

Want to help us serve 1,000,000 meals to the hungry?

Sign here.

Now every time you use the Card to buy anything at all, you're helping provide a meal for the hungry.

A new CD. An LSAT prep course. A pair of running shoes.

It makes no difference what you buy. Because as a Student Cardmember, each time you charge a purchase with the American Express Card from March 15 to April 30, 1993, you help pay for one meal for someone who's hungry.

The more purchases you make, no matter how big or small, the more meals you help provide. It's that simple.

Our goal? To help buy 1,000,000 meals* for America's hungry men, women and children.

To make it work, we've brought together a powerful team — you, our Student Cardmembers, and Share Our Strength. SOS is a nationwide non-profit organization fighting to end hunger. And they're doing it in some very resourceful ways.

For example, most restaurants have extra food at the end of the night, but they don't always know what to do with it. SOS does. They see to it that the food is delivered to those who need it. In fact, they've mobilized more than 5,000 restaurants to join the fight against hunger, here in the U.S. and around the world.

So next time you reach in your wallet to pay for a purchase, put it on the American Express Card. And help make a difference to someone who's hungry.

6-2, before UMass freshman Sara Demenkoff scored at the 7:08 mark. The Lady Knights added another goal before the half for a 7-3 lead.

Minutewoman Heather Burgett scored the first goal in the second half with 25:28 left in the game. Rutgers then answered with two goals before UMass could score again for a 9-5 final.

Coaches Bob Little and Karen Marley said they had nothing but praise for the defense despite the nine goals given up. According to the Little and Marley, Nancy Kane did an outstanding job in shutting down the Lady Knights' leading scorer Heather Jones, who did not score a goal and ended up with three assists.

Julie Midlik was a standout on offense for UMass yesterday as she scored two goals, as was Keri Brooks. Racheal Splaine scored another goal to add to her team-high total of 11 goals.

■ Gorillas

Shillinglaw, whose Blue Hens have never beaten UMass in seven tries.

Meanwhile, Depp, who scored four goals in a game for the third time this season, and Triolo, a freshman midfielder who is now third on the team in goals with 9, stepped up their game and took advantage of the scoring opportunities offered them.

Did Depp and Triolo think the attention the Blue Hens paid Millon had anything to do with their success on offense?

"Definitely," said Depp, whose hard line-drive shots belied the fact he has a sore shoulder. "They tried to shut off Mark and that left me open."

"I was always open when he had the ball," Triolo said.

Although Shillinglaw downplayed his team's defensive preparation afterwards, the Blue Hens attempted the same defensive scheme Hofstra did two weeks ago — play zone when Millon has the ball, man-to-man when he does not. They abandoned this tactic when the Gorillas' zone offense found Depp wide-open for a couple of uncontested 15-yard cranks that found the back of the net.

When Depp wasn't scoring, Triolo was. He notched three of his four scores in the first half, when Delaware was still controling possession and capitalizing on a slow start by the UMass close defense. He made some impressive efforts on those scores, particularly for his third goal.

With the game tied 4-4 and the Blue Hens still very much in the hunt, Triolo picked up a ground ball, lost his defender on a shoulder fake, came around the back of the crease and stuffed the ball home. UMass did not trail again.

From there, the Gorillas, wearing their home uniforms for the first time this season, picked up their defensive intensity a notch and found their shots reaching the back of the Delaware net more often.

UMass goalie Tom LoPresti, starting in his fourth game, also played better as the game went on, stopping eight shots and fueling the Gorilla transition game, both from inside and outside the goal crease. Assistant coach Mario Lopez complimented LoPresti on his effort.

"[LoPresti] was under control with the ball today," said Lopez. "We've been working on that with him and he's doing a better job."

In the early going, the Gorillas got off good shots but found themselves stymied by the play of Delaware goalie Jamie Blalock, who made most of his 11 saves in the first half.

UMass also fell prey to first-half defensive lapses, as Mike Miner and Thad Boyce both scored unassisted to give Delaware its 2-0 first quarter lead.

But the Gorillas shrugged off their early-game lapses and held an opponent under 10 goals for the fourth time this season in an all-around solid showing.

■ baseball

"We felt that Jay pitched fairly well and has control of three pitches, and we wanted to start the series with someone who did," said head coach Mike Stone. "He's got a strong arm and we were just glad he could get them out for seven innings."

Right-hander Jeff Toothaker had no run support in Saturday's second game, a 4-0 Minutemen loss. Toothaker gave up single runs in the first and third innings and a pair in the fifth. First baseman Dan Vasalani was the main culprit, taking Toothaker deep for a home run.

Steve Kline (4-3) picked up the win, pitching a complete game two-hit shutout while striking out seven. Howard and center fielder Nelson Ubaldo were the only UMass players to get hits.

The rubber game on Sunday turned out to be a blowout in West Virginia's favor, as the Mountaineers were down 4-3 in the fourth but scored eight runs in the last three innings.

Jim Telgheder (2-4) took the loss as WVU went 16-for-40 at the plate. All in all, it was another weekend where UMass went down in the A-10 standings.

Lacrosse forges ahead 12-8 in home opener

ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN
Midfielder Chris Nentwich and the University of Massachusetts lacrosse team handled the Delaware Blue Hens 12-8 Saturday in their home opener.

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

It has become common strategy for opponents of the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team to concentrate their efforts on slowing down All-American attacker Mark Millon. The prevailing logic is that if you slow down Millon, you slow down UMass.

Eric Triolo and Wes Depp proved that theory wrong Saturday at Garber Field. While Millon was limited to one goal and one assist, Triolo and Depp scored four goals and assisted one each, leading the Gorillas to a 12-8 home-opening victory over Delaware.

UMass improved to 6-2 and remained ranked 10th in the United States Intercollegiate Lacrosse Poll. They face state arch-rival Harvard tomorrow at 3 p.m. in Cambridge.

The Blue Hens (3-6) played a physical, scrappy game and never let UMass get comfortable. They took an early 2-0 lead and stayed within 3 goals throughout the muddy, rainy contest. But they could not overcome their own mistakes, nor could they counter the depth and strength of the Gorillas' bench.

"Credit UMass for capitalizing on our mistakes," said Delaware coach Jim

Women lose at home to Villanova, Rutgers

By ANDREW BRYCE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse team played their first two home games in three years this weekend, bowing to Villanova 11-8 on Sunday and losing to Rutgers 9-5 on Monday.

The first six minutes of the game against Villanova was all UMass as the Minutewomen jumped out to a 3-0 lead in the first 6:08 of the first half on three goals scored by senior co-captain Racheal Splaine.

UMass was then outscored 5-2 for the remainder of the first half, making it a 5-5 tie at halftime.

In the second half, Villanova (2-11) scored six unanswered goals, including four by Leigh Ann Leone, to take an 11-5 lead with 11:08 left in the game. UMass' Splaine made the score more respectable as she scored three goals in the final 3:38 for the 11-8 Villanova win.

In yesterday's game, Splaine opened up against Rutgers with a goal 44 seconds into the game, but the Lady Knights stormed back to take a 3-2 lead on three goals by Jennifer Durant.

Rutgers then increased their lead to

Baseball loses a pair, wins one on the road

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts baseball team struggled along last weekend at West Virginia, losing two games by 11-4 and 4-0 counts and winning one, a 5-4 squeaker. The Minutemen (8-15, 3-8 in the Atlantic 10) could not stop the potent Mountaineer offense, surrendering 19 runs in the series.

Freshman Jay Murphy, who normally sees action out of the bullpen, started his second game of the year in the series opener, pitching a complete game and holding on for the 5-4 win.

Murphy allowed only six hits and three walks while inducing West Virginia into hitting ground ball outs. Murphy picked up his first win of the year with the help of third baseman Steve Corradi (3-for-3) and right fielder Justin Howard (2-for-3 with a double and 2 RBI). Ryan Williams (3-3) was tagged with the loss.

Minutewomen travel to Providence today

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team will kick off their last and biggest week of the short spring season today as the Minutewomen travel to Providence to meet the Lady Friars. Following today's match, UMass will travel to Storrs, Connecticut to take on the University of Connecticut on Wednesday.

UMass (3-1) head coach Judy Dixon said that these two matches are ones which the team has geared towards.

"UConn and Providence are the two biggest matches for this season," said Dixon. "I like the fact that the matches are back-to-back, it gives us a chance to come right back and play again."

During this short spring season the strength of the Minutewomen has been their depth. Both their No. 5 and No. 6 singles players, sophomore Alyssa Cohen and senior Kelly Grim, respectively, are 4-0 on the year.

The other undefeated singles player for UMass has been freshman No. 1 Liesl

Softball sweeps A-10 foes St. Joseph's, Temple

By JASON NASH
Collegian Staff

After beginning their season with a tough schedule and an even tougher record (7-14), the University of Massachusetts women's softball faces Central Connecticut today at Totman Field today in a 3 p.m. start with some renewed confidence after a 4-0 weekend.

The Minutewomen picked up four wins in doubleheader contests over Atlantic 10 rivals St. Joseph's (9-2, 10-0) on Saturday and Temple (3-0, 7-1) on Sunday, bringing their season record to 11-14 overall and 7-1 in the Atlantic 10.

"This was a great win for us," said starting pitching Darlene Claffey. "The whole team got in a great rhythm all weekend and it helped tremendously."

Indeed, UMass had more rhythm than "Soul Train", as the Minutewomen pumped out 50 hits, 29 runs and hit .427 as a team all weekend. Meanwhile, the UMass pitching was that much better allowing just four runs, none of them earned.

"We played more to our potential," said Minutewomen third baseman Laurie Dondarski. "This is a definite turning point, I think we found ourselves."

Game one against St. Joseph's found UMass sophomore Kelly Daut give up just two hits over seven innings, while senior Sherri Kuchinskas started her weekend assualt on opposing pitchers going 2-for-3 with three runs batted in.

The back end of the doubleheader saw Darlene Claffey pitch five stellar innings for a complete game, as UMass put the 10-run rule in effect, scoring their tenth by the fifth inning. At the plate, Stacy Nichols (3-for-4), Kuchinskas (4-for-4, four R.B.I.) and Heather Dorsey (3-for-3) all were exceptional.

Sunday's saw the Minutewomen travel to Temple, in which they dominated another A-10 foe. Daut was again stellar, throwing more goose eggs and scattering four hits for a complete game shutout. Meanwhile, Kuchinskas

Ex-BC assistant Mallen named UMass head hockey coach

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

They have the building, they have a conference, and finally they have hired a head coach, one who is hungry for the restart of UMass hockey.

Former Boston College assistant hockey coach Joe Mallen was named head hockey coach at the University of Massachusetts last Saturday in a press conference at the William D. Mullins Memorial Center.

"It may be an understatement, but this is a dream come true for me," said Mallen. "The program at the University of Massachusetts is going to be an exciting one and one that in due time will be a force in Hockey East.

"I am excited about the opportunity and challenge. I am anxious to begin the development of a top-notch program in what has to be considered a sleeping giant in hockey land."

Mallen was named head coach by athletic director Bob Marcum, who concluded a national search for a coach to lead the rebirth of the UMass program which was suspended at the conclusion of the 1978-79 season.

"Of all the candidates who wanted this position, [Mallen] was the one who wanted it most. He was the one who was most persistent," said Marcum. "If he approaches recruiting as persistently as he approached this job, I think without a doubt our hockey program's in great hands."

A 1977 graduate of Michigan State, the 37-year-old Mallen was the head coach at UMass-Boston from 1979-85, where he guided the Beacons from a club team to a Division II varsity program with a 86-48-2 record. He spent a year as an assistant at U.S. International before moving onto BC.

Mallen has been the Commonwealth of Massachusetts Director for USA Hockey's National Coaching Acheivement Program since 1984. He has directed the USA Hockey Satellite Camp in Boston for the past four summers where he trained players in 16 to 18 age bracket. During the summer of 1991, he was the Eastern training coordinator for the 1992 U.S. Olympic Hockey team.

"Our goal here is to put UMass hockey on the national map as soon as possible," Mallen said. "I remember reading in my history books that the Minutemen were defined as a group which could assemble in a short period of time. For the 1993-94 season, that is what we'll be doing."

Mallen signed a four-year contract, which began last Sunday, for undisclosed terms. He will represent the

FBI blames cult leader in Waco fire

By KELLEY SHANNON
Associated Press

WACO, Texas — Some doomsday cultists may have been shot trying to flee "Ranch Apocalypse" before others started the inferno that left scores dead, investigators searching the still-smoldering ruins said Tuesday.

Whatever happened in the final hours at the Branch Davidian compound Monday, federal agents said responsibility for the carnage rests solely with the group's leader, David Koresh.

"He killed those he controlled," President Clinton said at the White Hose.

Koresh and 85 others were believed to have died in the fire that ended the cult's 51-day standoff with federal agents: there were nine survivors, four of whom remained hospitalized Tuesday.

Investigators began pulling bodies out of the rubble, but were slow because "ammunition was still cooking and exploding" in the wreckage, said FBI agent Jeff Jamar. Officials said it could take two weeks to gather all the evidence.

The Clinton administration's handling of the case was sharply questioned by victims' relatives and attorneys, politicians and observers worldwide. Clinton defended Attorney General Janet Reno, who approved the FBI effort to use a tank to knock holes in the compound walls and teargas the cult members out, but said, "I signed off on this."

Five cult members who survived the blaze appeared in federal court, wearing orange jail suits and shackled by the ankle. One of them, Remos Avrram, told reporters that an FBI tank spraying tear gas into the compound had knocked over a lantern and started the fire, and that the cult had "no plan for suicide."

The FBI said its snipers saw cultists setting blazes and that a survivor told investigators that lantern fluid had been poured throughout the wooden complex.

Texas Rangers at the compound began investigating the deadly shootouts that erupted at the beginning of the siege, during raids Feb. 28 by federal Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms agents. Four agents were killed and 16 were wounded while trying to execute search warrants for alleged firearms violations.

Students offer views on finalist

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

Editor's note: This is the first of a two-part series on the chancellorship finalists.

Although University of Massachusetts chancellorship finalist David K. Scott is among the finalists for Michigan State University presidency, opinions about Scott on the Michigan campus vary.

Scott was Michigan State University's provost from 1986 to 1992, before going on sabbatical to teach at Oxford University in England.

Noting that Scott seemed interested in the lives of the Michigan State students, Student Assembly Chairperson Aron Mefford said Scott and Former Michigan State President John DiBiaggio had open forums with students three to four times a year. DiBiaggio will be inaugurated on April 25 as president of Tuft's University.

"If you want someone in, who will listen to people, he is the person," Mefford said. "I have not heard anything negative about him. He is very frank and open to the students."

Although Scott was interested in the land-grant mission of Michigan State, Mefford said this created a conflict with the Board of Trustees, who were more commercially-geared toward research and athletics. But despite the underlying tension, Mefford said Scott's relationship with the Board of Trustees stayed professional.

POWER to hold concert to help women's shelter

By SANDRA ROSE
Collegian Staff

The Hatch Bar will be rocking with the sounds of four local bands performing a benefit concert for a battered women's shelter on Thursday at 8 p.m.

The bands are Onion Bob, Foo, Canine Bastards and Manghani, said organizer Christin Lee.

The Progressive Organization for Women's Rights is sponsoring the concert with the additional support from WMUA and the Hatch Bar in an effort to raise money for Necessities and Necessidades, a women's crisis center in Northampton.

Necessities and Necessidades provides an immediate crisis shelter for women and their children leaving their batterers, a 24-hour hotline, peer support and counseling, legal advocacy and is part of the Massachusetts Coalition of Battered Women, explained Lee, who is also treasurer of POWER.

The concert is one of several plans for POWER in their attempts to do coalition-building and outreach within the five-college community, said Lee. POWER organized bus trips for the annual pro-choice rally in Washington D.C. in conjunction with the National Organization for Women and does networking with the Women's Action Committee.

POWER was first organize at UMass in 1982 as a chapter of NOW, but changed its name for legal reasons.

"We are now a registered student organization, but we're still in the process of building our memebership and identity," Lee said.

Besides the concert, the group is talking about organizing a women's health conference for nest semester, developing a proposal to include a mandatory rape and sexual assault awareness class for all new students, and looking into complaints against University Health Services.

Lee said the membership of the group consists of UMass women, but they encourage all women to join and participate. POWER meets every Wednesday at 7:30 in 306 Student Union, has funding from the Student Government Association and a pro-active membership, according to Lee.

"We are a political group," said LaRouchelle, "who wants to get the University involved and educated about various issues."

Members of POWER expressed their concern that the concert was to be held on the same night as the annual Take Back the Night March, but supported the event, and encouraged people to came to the concert after the rally.

"The concert doesn't end until midnight, and so it's an ideal event to come to if you're planning on going to the rally first," Lee said.

UM to host conference

Puerto Rican issues to be addressed

By KENNETH MAISONET
Collegian Staff

On April 22-23 a Symposium on Puerto Rican Migration and Education will be hosted University of Massachusetts Campus Center.

The first part of the symposium was held at the University of Puerto Rico in November 1992. The symposium is sponsored by Consejo de Education Superior de Puerto Rico (UPR), the Cultural Diversity and Curriculum Reform Project at UMass and the Mauricio Gaston institute at UMass/ Boston in collaboration with the Latin American Studies Program and AHORA.

The conference fulfills the need to create a connection, providing the mechanism students need to understand the socio-political and educational obstacles facing Puerto Rican immigrants, according to Jalil Mendoza, president of AHORA, a UMass Spanish-speaking organization.

"We need to establish a connection and raise the awareness of issues affecting Puerto Ricans," Mendoza said. "We want to create a permanent research arm between Puerto Rico and the United States in hopes of developing a dialogue in which Puerto Rico is the focus this year, and next year programming will center on the Dominican Republic and Mexico."

The Conference will offer workshops which will discuss topics such as Bilingual Education and Puerto Rican Students, Higher Education: Recruitment and Retention, Collaboration Research between Puerto Rico and the United States, Critical Pedagogy and Language Acquisition for Puerto Rican Students.

Manuel Frau, adjunct education professor at UMass, noted the symposium is intended to "bring together" educators from Puerto Rico and the Massachusetts Public School System.

"In the long term we need to build a connection between the Puerto Rico's department of education and the Massachusetts Department of Education, in an effort to put together information and resources to establish communication on dealing with the problems of the Puerto Rican community," Frau said.

Former U.S senator and presidential candidate Walter Mondale, was aware of the discontinuity within the Puerto Rican community, Frau said.

"I used to think that a fast way of emptying a hearing room was to announce a hearing on the Mexican-American problems within the educa-problems," Mefford said the University had an 11 percent increase in tuition and fees last year.

"David is a person more committed to education, rather than a corporate [agenda]," Mefford said.

But Jason Richards, chairperson of the Alliance of Lesbian-Bi-Gay Students, said Scott did not attend student meetings out of his own will nor did he truly listen to students. Richards said he found Scott very controlling and aloof when he worked with him on an academic council.

"You could talk to him. But if it didn't go according to his agenda, he would go along his merry way," Richards said. "He never seemed hands-on, very aloof."

When Scott spoke at the UMass student forum, he mentioned that he got a task force together to examine lesbian, bisexual and gay issues. But Richards said the task force was mainly faculty, who did not make their recommendations according to what the students wanted.

Women need to set norms, states official

MATT KAHN / COLLEGIAN
Barbara Montgomery

By KRISTEN LANS
Collegian Staff

Barbara Montgomery was told to sign her memos "Mrs. Charles Montgomery" in 1973.

Now, as the associate vice president of academic affairs at the University of New Hampshire, Montgomery said Friday women need to establish some norms for the University to follow.

Montgomery addressed the issue of implementing an agenda for women at the University of Massachusetts as part of the University's second annual reception to honor the women who work here.

"In 1973 women in higher education were taken for granted under the going norms — the norms established by men," Montgomery said. "We need to get back to being taken for granted, but under a different set of norms."

Carol Wallace, co-chairperson of the Council on the Status of Women at UMass, said an agenda has been drafted and will be given to the administration, after feedback from campus organizations and unions is reviewed. The agenda was written to address issues of concern to students, faculty and staff.

Wallace said the council worked earlir this year to make the University comply with Title IX of the Education Amendments, which prohibits sex discrimination at institutions receiving federal aid. Title IX was violated in the University's athletic program, Wallace said.

"Women's lacrosse, tennis and volleyball were reinstated as a result of a lawsuit the women brought against the University," Wallace said. "Men's soccer and tennis were also reinstated, but without the necessity of a lawsuit."

An agenda is necessary to insure the University will act on the behalf of all women, students as well as staff, Montgomery said.

"Sanctions for those who do not conform to policies carries a message better than anything does," Montgomery said.

Students look for road to peace

Establish drive to plant trees in Israel's Negev Desert

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

Although many of the violent conflicts occurring throughout the world may often seem beyond the scope of individuals, two UMass students are doing their parts to spread a message of peace and hope.

Greg Reitman, a senior history major, and junior art major John Bela have organized a tree drive, titled "The Giving Tree: Rooted in Peace," which will be held from April 21 through the 30.

People can donate either $5 or $10 for trees to be planted in Israel's Negev Desert, a region in the southern part of of Israel. Reitman stressed that the region is not one of the areas which is contested among Israelis and Palestinians.

"It is important for us to begin taking responsibility for the world environment," Bela said.

The money from the drive will go to the Jewish National Fund, which began reforestation of land in Israel in 1901. Other groups have already created the John F. Kennedy Freedom Forest and the Martin Luther King Forest through the JNF, to revitalize barren lands and use the land to provide reminders of freedom and renewal.

Reitman and Bela said the trees should serve to help to revitalize the region's arid land and are symbolic of planting seeds of peace in a region historically torn by strife.

The purpose of the drive, according to Reitman and Bela, is to help send a message of hope to people and to bring various campus groups together.

"By bringing all types of people together. . . you have to think of the impact it would have throughout the nation," Reitman said.

Reitman said he feels the violence occurring throughout the world indicates that people have become too accustomed to conflict.

"The cycle of violence has been going on for so long, people forget to break it," Reitman said. "Why is it that no one is trying to do something for the good?"

Reitman said he began to realize the "value of life and the environment we live in" while he was in Israel during the Persian Gulf War in 1990.

Reitman added that when he attended a policy conference in Washington last March, he said he spoke to politicians who he felt were focusing on the wrong issues.

"Everyone talks about legislation," Reitman said. "What is important is the grass roots, which starts from our own ethnic parts -- it all starts from the same things."

Reitman and Bela have put together a pamphlet describing the reasons behind their effort, and Reitman said he has had over 10,000 copies made.

"UMass demonstrates, on a small scale, the same kind of divisions that act as obstacles to peace in the Middle East," the pamphlet states. "If we can't overcome them here, how can we expect other people in other parts of the world to settle their differences?"

Reitman said many campus groups have been supportive of his efforts, including MassPIRG, the Undergraduate Student Senate, four area governments, Hillel and a number of the fraternites and sororities at the University.

Donations to the tree drive can be sent to Hillel House, 388 N. Pleasant Street, #15, Amherst, with checks payable to UMass Hillel.

Filmmaker seeks out positives

Russian shows new 'challenges and opportunities'

By NICOLE DUMAS
Collegian Staff

By presenting the hopes and fears of the common people struggling with the harsh realities of the fall of communism, Russian filmmaker Marina Goldovskaya reaffirms her belief that the media needs to portray a more positive outlook on life.

Goldovskaya started filming "The Shattered Mirror: A Diary of a Time of Trouble" the day after the death of her mother, whom she mentions in the film. The film was shown Monday night at Amherst College.

Goldovskaya's family members and friends were subjects in her film, which gave her something personal to study, as she searched for a central focus.

"I had no idea what the subject would be. There was trouble in my heart and trouble in my country," Goldovskaya said. "This is my diary. It is a very personal film."

Goldovskaya set out to the streets of Moscow with her Super VHS, a camera flexible enough to allow her to travel lightly and get close to her subjects.

"I wanted to be alone with my characters," she said, as she attempted to capture a glimpse of the citizens coping with the changes that resulted from new reforms in the country.

According to Goldovskaya, "The Shattered Mirror" is a documentary "about the new life, challenges and opportunities facing the people of Russia in their day-to-day struggle for survival."

"We are making a film about ourselves, our lives, about our hopes and fears," she said.

One character in the film bought a one-way ticket to America in search of a better life. It was all he could afford. He left his wife behind, hoping some day to be with her again.

"Here we are going through a period of anxiety. There must be radical changes," he said.

Asked whether Goldovskaya thought her film would create any social problems in Russia, she replied that is was not her country she was concerned about.

"In Russia it's OK. Documentary films are very popular," she said. "I wanted it to be shown in the United States. I think it is important to be shown here."

"The Shattered Mirror" ends on a positive note, showing a man and woman who were just married. The couple was optimistic, saying that they could survive any changes simply because they were in love.

Goldovskaya stressed that the media is giving out too much negative information, and that positive messages, like the married couple, are needed to give people hope in times of confusion and struggle.

"There must be balance on the amounts of negative information poured on the heads of the poor people," she said. Otherwise, people will start believing their conditions are the only way possible for them to live and that there is no alternative way of life, she said.

"It doesn't mean that we should lie," she said. "You must look at the sun and say it is still shining. In spite of it all, the sun is still shining."

Olver critical of television's role

By ADAM RATTINER
Collegian Staff

The role of television in political campaigns causes voters to focus on the wrong issues, U.S. Rep. John Olver (D-Amherst) told a group of local college Democrats Friday night at Amherst College.

Olver held a discussion with Democratic students from the Five College area and addressed topics ranging from the role of the media in politics to the conflict in the Balkans.

Noting the House of Representatives passed a bill last year on voluntary limits for elections, Olver said Former President George Bush vetoed the bill.

"Bush used the most financing of any president in history for his election," Olver said.

Because television focuses on a candidate's brief message and image, Olver said it tends to distort. Adding that he disliked the political dialogue, coming from the television campaign. Olver said he prefers the print medium.

"Television is such a powerful tool. It swamps out all that you can do in any other way. You have to be very stark and to the point," Olver said. "I would rather put out paper."

Clinton has taken a more active stance on issues like education than Bush did, Olver said. Furthermore Clinton gives less lip service and has a better education record, Olver said.

But there is still a long way to go, Olver said.

Controlling the cost of health care delivery services and cutting agriculture is a must, Olver said, or the deficit will rise.

"When Reagan and Bush were in power, expenditures went up and revenue went down," Olver said. "Bush left us virtually on our knees economically."

Yet Clinton must not only improve his domestic policies, Olver said, but foreign policies as well. It is up to the United States to take a more active the Bosnian War, Olver said.

"[The Serbs] will "cleanse" until the Western countries stop it. The U.N. is holding the Bosnians for the Serbs," Olver said. "Bosnians are landlocked. They can't get weapons."

Over, who is on the House's Appropriations Committee, was elected in June 1991 to fill the seat vacated by the death of former U.S. Rep. Silvio Conte. Olver has been in politics for over 25 years, having served in the state senate for 22 years.

Explaining his current position on the powerful Appropriations Committee, Olver said he has little influence in the committee.

"I have zero seniority on appropriations right now," Olver said.

tional system," Mondale said in 1970. "But I have now found that to clear a hearing even faster was to discuss the Puerto Rican educational problem."

The symposium will be a stepping stone in developing a collaborative relationship, said University Professor Emeritus Luis Fuentes, who will be a keynote speaker at the symposium.

"The symposium is an effort to discuss mutual concerns affecting Puerto Ricans in the U.S.," Fuentes said.

Sonia Nieto, adjunct professor in the Cultural Diversity and Curriculum Reform Project Program at the University, said she believes the symposium will the first step in creating a dialogue between various sectors of the community at large.

"We are bringing people together who will discuss issues in regards to educational excellence for Puerto Rican students," Nieto said. "And teachers, administrators, policy-makers and students will have the opportunity to discuss some of these issues."

Admission to the conference is $34 for UMass students with a valid I.D. and $55 for non-students. Scholarships are available but limited. For further information contact Manuel Frau at 545-1551 or Jalil Mendoza 545-2479.

As for people of African descent, let's learn how to spend more energy loving Blackness, and not only when we are victimized. We must learn how to articulate our experiences. In so doing we can learn how to separate the important issues from from the unimportant.

This will allow us move on to higher planes of communication. There is a systematic way to decolonize our minds and it starts with that self love so many of us lack. Do away with your own internalized oppression. Materialistic importance is also one of our boundaries, because the problem does not disappear when we overcome our economic limitations.

We must learn that it is important to build coalitions based on political ideology, common goals, rather than solely on race. Our racialization a sign that we have not decolonized our minds. "We do not need to eradicate difference to feel solidarity. We do not need to share common oppression to fight equally to end oppression."

Gil White, author of Europe on 84¢ a Day is North America s number one authority on low budget traveling. Over the past eleven years and fifty-five countries, Gil has gathered 28 imaginative and fun cost-saving methods for obtaining free transportation, 16 for free accommodation, 3 for free food, and 4 for saving on the foreign money exchange. The methods provide an educational experience and are the highlights for any traveler.

Gil's formula for reducing the major expenses is simple: the traveler should possess enthusiasm, an interest in meeting the people, and more importantly, be willing to return the hospitality and generosity by performing simple chores, such as, washing dishes or by offering a small gift. This 'trade-off' allows the traveler not only to reduce the costs, but more importantly, obtain a greater insight and understanding of the country and its people without sacrificing his or her health, enjoyment and integrity.

Bosnia must be shrunk to save it

As we enter Holocaust Memorial Week, we are reminded of the greatest crime humans ever inflicted on fellow humans. The memorial is a forum for reflection. Many questions will be asked: "How did it happen?" "Why did it happen?" These questions are interesting, but are purely academic. I am more concerned in making sure it never happens again. One does not need to look far to see tragedy in the making. I am reluctant to use the term "holocaust," because there has been only one holocaust. To compare it with other massacres and systems of discrimination is to deny the magnitude of the crime. I am referring to the raging war in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

Since Yugoslavia began breaking apart nearly two years ago, I have had ambivalent feelings toward the event. Yugoslavia was created by Marshal Tito in such a way the Serbs would not be incorporated into one republic, but divided among several. When Croatia declared independence, I understood the fear and anxiety the Serbian minority felt. Croatia had been a Nazi puppet state that gleefully deported Jews to Auschwitz, as well as carrying on its own extermination of Serbs on the side. My fears were confirmed when Croatian President France Tudjman proudly declared that neither he nor his wife had any "Serb or Jewish blood." I was angry at the way the Serbs began treating the innocent Croats, but I was repulsed to find out that the newly-formed Croatian Army was wearing the same skull and bones badge worn under the Nazi regime. It was not until the war spread to Bosnia that my feelings began to change.

The Muslims are also not entirely guiltless. The Bosnian Muslims formed the only Islamic SS unit during World War II, and specialized in executing Serbs. But it was the extreme brutality and genocidal designs, as well as the repulsive "ethnic cleansing" that made me turn my back on the Serbs. It was impossible to condone their actions; not even recent history could. Usually refugees are the result of war; this is the first time a military conflict has sought to make refugees the aim of the war. Cease fires were established and ignored. It became a vicious cycle of violence.

The world has now generally coalesced around the Vance-Owen proposal. It is an absolutely ridiculous proposal. It calls for the creation of 10 autonomous provinces within Bosnia, essentially "ethnic enclaves." It is preposterous to assume that Moslems, Croats and Serbs can live together again this century, let alone this month. Separation of the peoples is the ideal solution. Bosnia must be shrunk to save it. Three separate, ethnically-based independent states, must be created. I am not happy with this proposal, but the world took too long to react to save the situation on the ground. An international tribunal must be set up to try the criminals. In the memory of the six million dead it is our duty, our obligation, to act now.

In the prison of our minds

I missed the stars.

Tonight the black patches of darkness appear and fade with the passing clouds that drift by overhead. Everything seems so much clearer under the blanket of darkness with only the echoes of civilization below as a reminder that you aren't alone in the night. I regret the moon is hidden beyond the wall of cinder that makes up my dorm. Her face would be very attractive behind the veils of thin haze that linger past the distant stars this evening.

Nathan
CRICK

These balconies offer such a peaceful view of this campus, and listening to the sounds of the nightly basketball game and people walking below almost make me want to write something. Some nights are funny that way.

A friend of mine came out here while I was watching a couple people play frisbee under the lamplight. He wondered if we all ended up believing in some kind of God, or any equivalent manifestation. That it was natural. No one can accept they are nothing but dust. Nobody wants to be dust. The people just kept on playing frisbee.

I missed the stars because I couldn't get away and watch them anymore in the cold of winter. It keeps you inside and confines your reality to cement walls and bad TV. You can see the sky and the ground outside through a window, but it is white and sterile and simply reflects everything back at you. It's like being in a hall of mirrors where everything is merely a reflection of yourself. It is suffocating, because your actions all seem to hold such incredibly important and self-centered implications so you just don't do anything.

There was a car that pulled up and stopped in front of Chadbourne. Somebody got out, waved goodbye, and jogged into the entrance of the building. The car sped off, took a left and disappeared. Under the expanse of darkness and the distance of lights those people seemed so small. There are times when you stand out here and realize things like that, and it makes you feel like you are wasting time being just another piece of dust in a big ball of lint.

It's funny. Last year I saw that movie with Billy Crystal where three guys go out to the West to find the meaning of their lives by herding cattle across Colorado. I was so mad when all they had to do was find one thing they loved and stick to it. What happened to trying change the world? Fighting against the system? Where's Big Brother, dammit?

My older brother is currently way out in Minnesota. I went to visit him when he had first lived in Colorado, and while I was there I got lost wandering around a park near Boulder. My feet hurt and I was thirsty and the sun was going down, but when I finally got into town and to a McDonalds I felt a little depressed. There were no groundhogs in the middle of town, and without them I could feel those walls closing around me again. I wanted to go back out and get lost under the open sky. I felt more human among the rodents.

But I'm not under the shadow of the Rockies anymore, and neither is my brother. I'm sitting seven floors up from the ground of Amherst, and he's moving off to Illinois.

I'm not sure just what it is about it up here, but for the first time in a while I don't feel confined. You can make a sort of prison for yourself sometimes when you can't imagine anything outside of your own little world. Where the sky belongs only to you and nobody else can behold the stars on which you wonder at. After a while they get to you, though. Especially when people are playing basketball below them, making echoes off the hill.

It's kind of pleasant. Maybe I'll go lie naked in a field somewhere. Hell, the stars won't care. Dust will be dust.

Romantic gestures show respect

Cutter Garcia, amen and good for you! Writing your column (Collegian, April 7) about being a romantic took guts; kudos for having the courage to write on what can be a sensitive subject.

And you're right — there are plenty of us (namely women) out here who know we're perfectly capable of opening a door for ourselves, but still very much prefer having a gentleman (they're a vanishing breed, frightened out of existence) open it for us.

The issue isn't who does and doesn't open the door. The issue is respect. Now, I'm sure we all know how to spell that, but do we know what it means — let alone how to demonstrate it? That (to me, anyway, though I do know I'm not alone on this) is what opening a door, waiting until I get inside, along with various other romantic gestures communicate: respect. It means that he, whoever he may be, has enough respect for me, as a woman, to actually go out of his way to demonstrate it. And that means a lot to me.

Which is why I'm not going to fall for any run of the mill Joe who thinks he's modern because he lets me walk myself home, thank you very much; but I'll wait for someone who respects me a bit more, someone more old fashioned!

Again, Cutter, good for you!

The Happy Valley lends deaf ear to Bosnia's cries for help

Our Happy Valley is currently hosting a Five College Conference on the situation in former Yugoslavia and its worldwide implications. In this principled, liberal valley, we pride ourselves on strong social and public awareness, radical thinking and active re-examining of all forms of oppression.

Yet the outcries from those suffering one of the worst genocides in human history are barely heard. People, professors and students alike, are turning a deaf ear and there is next to no attendance to the Conference, titled "Bosnia Under Siege," in spite of its wide publicity and excellent speakers.

Organizers have brought political analysts, ambassadors, journalists and representatives of various human rights organizations to inform the public about the real situation and options of the forsaken victims of the communist neo-Nazi Serbian Nationalistic Army and Militiamen. They are also here to outline things the general public can do as an alternative to the current appalling inaction.

Economist and writer Sean Gervasi voiced the official version that military involvement is the only way to help and this threatens to become another Vietnam for the United States. George Kenney, at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, recently resigned from the U.S. State Department to protest U.S. policy toward the Yugoslav crisis, offered overwhelming counter-evidence, questioning the real motives behind this official version.

Kenney pointed out that the U.S. government is gutlessly parroting public indifference in calling the situation in Yugoslavia "a civil war" instead of recognizing it as a war of Serbian aggression and acknowledging that it threatens to spark neo-Nazi nationalist passions and lead to a Third World War. Minds are being put to sleep with the lullaby of "national sovereignty and non-intervention."

Elena
MUSTAKOVA

So when those close to the situation are here to tell us there are alternative ways to help and not only moral but also national and international reasons to get involved, we are not even there to hear what they have to say.

The Five College Conference has underscored an irreconcilable contradiction. What has happened to all those who profess, and even teach, progressive ideological values? People who have committed themselves to the empowerment of women and minorities and to working for social justice? So shocking is the compartmentalization of values taking place that no connection is being made between racism, sexism and anti-Semitism in the United States and the racist policy of ethnic cleansing targeted at Moslems in the center of Europe.

When 10-year-old Moslem girls are gang-raped and tossed back bloody into the hands of their mothers, who themselves are awaiting their turn, and this is done by Orthodox Christians in an outburst of violent contempt for other faiths and cultures, why are anti-racism activists not calling on their ranks? When the last bastion of communist totalitarianism in the face of Milosevic is wielding its power over the heads of poverty-stricken powerless minorities, why are activists against classism and social injustice silent?

Where are the representatives of the feminist movement in this valley when their sisters in Bosnia are being raped and mutilated in the thousands? Why are we not responding to letters directed to women's organizations both by the women in Bosnia themselves and by helping organizations in the valley, as Francis Crowe from American Friends Service Committee attests? Where are all those women who gathered two months ago to discuss the future of the worldwide feminist movement?

We listened to Angela Davis remind us of the past parochialism of the feminism in the U.S. and of the need to redefine what global feminism stands for, yet how are we making our meaning now? How shall we look at each other's eyes at the next feminist conference when we gather once again to affirm our commitment to cut through existing power relations and make a difference for women around the world?

If we truly hold those high principles of respect for human rights and dignity, recognition of our common humanity and commitment to justice, we cannot afford such parochial attitudes when the world needs us to take a firm stand.

Blacks need to find ways to diminish self-hatred

"It is well-known that the Black race is the most oppressed and most exploited of the human family." — Ho Chi Minh

As Black people living in a White supremacist society we often fall victims of internalized oppression. In our journeys we encounter the "you are inferior" message in the mass media, academia, and from a slew of other sectors. Yet because none of us are passive victims of oppression, we should no longer believe that it is solely "the White man's fault." Our colonized minds (due to our history as a people) have allowed us to manifest a great deal of our aggression and provoked anger against our own.

Felicia
COUSINS

We are a part of a system that fosters the internalization of our inferiority complex. This inferiority complex is perpetuated in our relations with each other.

ON LOVING BLACKNESS

Due to our racist institutions such as education and media, Black Americans are convinced "that our lives are not complex and is therefore unworthy of sophisticated analysis and reflection," which in fact prevents an integrated analysis of race, class, gender and sexual orientation in the development of loving our Blackness.

It pains me to see the leaders of our "Black community," who are righteously committed to Black liberation struggle, adhere to the ideologies brainwashed into our colonized minds. Bell Hooks makes the point that "decolonized progressive Black individuals are amazed by the extent to which masses of Blacks (all of whom would identify as anti-prejudice) hold to the dominant oppressive ways of thinking, allowing these perspectives to determine how we see ourselves and other Black people."

We internalize ideas of White supremacist values when we make "good and bad hair" discussions a factor in our lives. We internalize these values when we utter comments like "she is pretty for a dark skin sister." We must realize this is self-hatred. Destruction of "Whiteness, as a source of human misery in the world" must be embraced not through Afro-centrism, but conquered with a premise that has nothing to do with the values of supremacy.

The systematic nature of U.S. imperialism maintains White supremacist beliefs on a national level and manifests itself onto a global agenda. Coming to this realization is not extremely difficult. The difficulty lies in the steps we take to move past our racialization. We must develop an integrated analysis in our struggle to eradicate the oppressive system that keeps us down. The fact that we are now able to sit in a classroom with our White counterparts or become SGA president does not mean racism has vanished or that we should become complacent.

WHITENESS LOVING BLACKNESS

Here in the Happy Valley and across the country Whiteness accepting Blackness is only to be accomplished if we don't mind being exploited, dehumanized or misrepresented. There are stereotypes of blackness that cause our self- destruction. As Hooks points out, "now we are bombarded by Black folks creating and marketing similar stereotypical images." If we need specifics, then take a look at our popular music that Americans want to hear. Take a look at Rex-in-Effect's "Rump Shakin" exploitating and dehumanizing of Black women (in the music video) and the sexism that is manifested.

An even more disturbing factor is the images of "Black beauty" that these videos perpetuate where the "Black" women are only a shade away from achieving "Whiteness," again promoting a severe amount of self hatred for those who do not fit into this category.

When we embark upon the issue of White/Black relationships both on a surface and intimate level, this analysis is brought forth: "Many of these women [and men] announce their break from White supremacist ideas and see themselves as non-racist, because they have transgressed racial boundaries by "f—ing the other."

By engaging in sexual practices with the "dark other," they feel they have separated themselves from their superiority complex and would like to believe sexual desire without real dialogue represents a progressive attitude. However this is just another disguised perpetuation of racism.

Therefore I suggest to all of you who have consumed, appropriated and exploited Black culture and representation, in an attempt to enhance the blank landscape of "Whiteness," you have to be willing to give up your "White cushy world." If you really intend to aid in the struggle to eradicate race and class differences, you must engage in meaningful dialogue and be willing to read about our real history. You must get over the guilt because then and only then can you begin to take the appropriate steps to transgress the boundaries of your own superiority complex. F—ing, as you must have learned by now, does not begin to embark on the problem.

King verdict discussed

I don't know about you, but I feel like a baby does when it cries and cries and someone sticks a pacifier in its mouth just to keep it quiet. Sound familiar to anyone?

They let those two officers go.

It really shouldn't come as any surprise though. I mean, the jury was under a lot of pressure, what with all the hype in the media, that if they found all of the officers not guilty, once again, there would be riots. So I guess it was decided they would satisfy everyone and make everyone happy. "We'll convict two of them, and let the other two walk. That's fair right?"

I don't think so.

Denise
HENRY

Yet people seem to be content. On TV and in the paper most people seem to be really excited about the verdict. And others don't seem to give a damn.

The other day on the bus, I overheard someone say, "My friend asked me if I had seen the verdict, and I said, 'you mean the movie with Robert Redford?'" And then she laughed.

Hello? Why would she want to pass that information on to anyone? I would feel ashamed if I were her. I know humans have short memories, but this is ridiculous.

Does anyone remember last year? The riots, the videotape? All of the fliers on campus? Protests on the Student Union steps — "No Justice No Peace?"

Does any of this ring a bell to anyone? What happened?

Either people shrug off this verdict and say justice is being served. Or ask, "what verdict?" — with a straight face.

Is this all that the system has to do? Drag this case out for so long that after a while people just don't care? I'm not saying that everyone should be out rioting and protesting, but is this all it takes? Give them what they want so they'll be quiet and we can go on with our lives.

It shouldn't be that easy.

They let those two officers go.

I'm not just referring to the two that were found not guilty. But, also the two who were convicted. They just released them from custody pending sentencing. That's it. This system is such a joke. I feel that all they did was say, "We are sorry you had to go through this ordeal. It must have been stressful for you. Go home and relax." And with that they probably gave them a slap on the hand and a ride home. Maybe even a free dinner.

Yet President Clinton says that the verdict "is a reminder that our courts are the proper forum for the resolution of even our deepest legal disputes."

I hate to be the one to burst your little bubble Bill, but there has been no resolution — or justice. If those officers were Black... well I think we know what would have happened. I wouldn't be writing this article on my reaction to this latest trial. Probably because there wouldn't have been a second trial — or a first. The decision would have been handed down right after the videotape was shown on March 4, 1991.

GUILTY, GUILTY GUILTY.

Earlier I mentioned that everyone seemed to have forgotten about the tape. But, I think that what people have really forgotten is what the beating of Rodney King means. The verdict this past weekend told me exactly what it means. Absolutely nothing!

But, according to Police Commissioner Francis Roache, this verdict shows that "the country has taken a quantum leap forward in terms of justice."

I don't know what country he's talking about, but it's not the same one I've been living in. A country that, for over two years, would debate on whether or not officers stepped out of bounds when they stopped Rodney King and nearly beat him to death. And still question the videotaped evidence that was presented right in front of them.

This only proves to me that this country has taken a quantum leap backwards.

Black women speak out

Presenting — Brotha Righteous and "Women Who Got It Going On!" No, this is not an In Living Color skit, it was a show on the UMass cable network to voice the opinions of a group of Black women on this campus. The show featured Yatisha Bothwell, Rachael Splaine, Desiree Joseph and Ann Lima, discussing issues that affect us as Black people and as women.

Yatisha
BOTHWELL

Everything you wanted to know from race relations, womanhood, and dealing with the opposite sex... The first question asked of the panel was what makes us the women we are today, and how we apply that to our lifestyle. Answers ranged from everything from family and friends, to one's goals, dreams and personal accomplishments. Splaine attributed her success to her constant striving to reach her goals and the things she does in the community for the betterment of herself and others.

Concerning ways of uplifting and bettering the community, the women recognized the lack of Black communalism and camaraderie due to a lack of mutual respect. With the help of communication and understanding the panel agreed that this could be rectified on the part of both men and women on this campus. Problem being, as recognized by many people, dissention among us for reasons of competition among Black women on this campus for Black men, and competition with White women for these same Black men.

The reason why we have to compete so fiercely, as brought out by Ann Lima, is because we as Black women do not demand

UMass student links past and present with images

By ADAM SCOTT ROBERTS
Collegian Staff

About Face Forward
Photographs by Seth Kaye
Hillel House

To help commemorate the beginning of Holocaust Memorial Week, About Face Forward, a photographic exhibition by UMass Fine Arts student Seth Kaye is now on display at the Hillel House through April 23.

The exhibit is set up like a long wall with large wood boards. On each partition of wood, a 90-degree angle is formed so at one angle the stories of the survivors is the only thing seen, and on the other side is a photographic representation where past meets present.

"I wanted the side panel and the main panels to be 90 degrees so you could look at it one way and see nothing but the interviews, nothing but the stories the people have and the other way you look at it, another 90 degrees you see nothing but the people," Kaye said.

The black and white photos are modern, but because they are done in black and white film, they give the impression of vintage images.

The titles "about face" and "face forward" were joined together to suggest a feeling of looking back at history while acknowledging the present. The idea that the past affects the present, and the future, is key to understanding the relationship between the interviews.

Kaye explains that the subject matter was something he felt strongly about dealing with.

"I had a hard time initially dealing with this project using traditional photography, and I was really into Mike and Doug Starn, brother photographers that use materials not traditionally associated with photography," Kaye said. "I was interested in the idea of using actual objects to add to the photography like the wood and the barbed wire."

Each wooden board which is uniquely arranged with barbed wire strips, metal pieces and a photo of the survivor as they look today. At the bottom of each wooden slate is a picture taken of original pictures from the Holocaust years. Specific quotes from the survivors have been burned into the wood to create an eerie effect. The burns in the wood panels correlate with the permanent Holocaust numbers that had been marked and tattooed on all people in the camps. One board reads "The fact remains it happened and it was allowed to go on, and no one blinked an eye... to change it, and when they wanted to change it, when they wanted to blink an eye about it, it was too late."

Each survivor's story is emotionally moving by the concrete descriptions of the horrid living conditions and treatments that they had to endure as children and young adults. Hedy Rose of Northampton is a survivor and her story entails many experiences she lived through.

"They take small, like shot glasses, actually maybe a little larger, light a flame under them which creates a vacuum inside and they plunk it on your back, and because it's created a vacuum it sort of sucks up as much of your skin, up in the cup. They put rows and rows of these all over your back and then yank them off. The effect of that is creating these huge welts on your back and terrible pain," she said. "I think they figured was that if they gave you a lot of pain someplace else you'd forget how miserable you were."

Yehudit Heller, assistant program director of Hillel, called the exhibit "wonderful."

"It's a student project, it is very striking because it takes your attention in many ways and many senses and the visual aspect of it is very very striking," Heller said.

"This is a living document. Part of these people in the exhibit were actually here at this campus talking, some of them will come and talk this Holocaust Memorial Week and I think this is very unique to see this part of history, at the same time it's walking and breathing around you," Heller said.

See Harry meet Sally this week on HSCN

By EDWARD W. HUMPHRIES
Collegian Staff

Well, this week marks the last week for the current playlist of movies on HSCN. Beginning next Wednesday, April 28, a new list of movies will begin a long run through May and June. Although most of the UMASS community will have left this campus and any vagrant thoughts of the Housing Services Cable Network far behind, those willing to put off finals preparation until roughly May 15 will be able to thrill to some of the films forecast for future weeks. Among the coming attractions is Robert Altman's voyeuristic view of Hollywood's underbelly in his masterful The Player. Until then, HSCN allows its current slate of movies to embark with a few new entries including Universal Soldier and a David Lynch double-feature.

When Harry Met Sally — It's the classic story of boy meets girl, girl avoids boy, boy falls for girl, girl gets maximum satisfaction out of a deli sandwich; all set to a great Harry Connick Jr. soundtrack and guided by the capable hands of director Rob Reiner, striving for his place in the Woody Allen sun (without the accompanying lawsuits). Leads Billy Crystal and Meg Ryan are great comic foils for each other and the chemistry between the two translates wonderfully on film. Among the scenic NY locales, Reiner creates a wonderful romantic fable culminating in a great New Year's Eve kiss. B+

Universal Soldier — Jean-Claude van Damme attempts to muscle into Arnold territory in this testosterone-infused tale of action, explosions and terminators on the lam. The story begins promisingly, with soldiers who killed in the Vietnam conflict are then re-animated by a shadowy US agency to fight terrorism in the near future, but essentially boils down into one long chase flick with evil-Unisol Dolph Lundgren in pursuit of the renegade Van Damme, whose memories of his past life cause him to flee captivity. Still, this is a wide leap for Van Damme from the low-budget kickboxing exploits he has languished in, and it features some spectacular action pieces (especially notable is an opening battle set at Hoover Dam) and a surprise in the casting of exceptional character actor Jerry Orbach. C+

M*A*S*H — Riding the razor's edge of strong anti-war statement and screwball comedy, this dark comedy following the exploits of the Mobile Army Surgical Hospital 4077th medical personnel remains as funny and biting as it was 23 years ago. Donald Sutherland, as Hawkeye Pierce and Elliot Gould as the infamous Trapper John, endure the horrors of the Korean war and the stupidity of the US military elite with an increasing series of fratboy pranks and pratfalls. Director Robert Altman displays a good ear for the rigors of military rhetoric and revels in his satirical attitude. Also featuring Robert Duvall, Sally Kellerman and Tom Skerrit, this is a true comedy classic. A

Incident at Oglala — Focusing on a murder investigation on Indian reservation land and the corrupt politics between US officials and militant American Indian groups, this documentary produced and narrated by Robert Redford and directed by British filmmaker Michael Apted is an insightful investigation into the injustices carried out on government allotted reservation land and the subsequent neglect these sparse lands have experienced. Apted focuses on the frustrations held by residents of the reservation and members of the Native American extremist group AIM (whose members come under fire in this investigation) and has fashioned an incredibly thought provoking documentation of a national tragedy. A-

Tuneful melodies await you

By ADAM GOULSTON
Collegian Staff

Every now and then, one's palate becomes a little soiled by grunge. Admittedly grunge has its appeal — it vents rage, its crunching and simple hooks satisfy that pressing need for intense musical therapy. However, the needs of many transcend those which grunge can appease. For this growing crowd comes the staid melodies of the Netherlands' own Bettie Serveert.

Rolling Stone has billed the Dutch quartet as "a sweeter kind of grunge," but this is highly misleading. Bettie Serveert is to grunge what 10,000 Maniacs is to hardcore. Bettie Serveert is such a welcome sound in today's distorted market that Northampton's Iron Horse seized the opportunity to present the band at the first date they had available, that being this evening.

With tickets still available, this is an opportunity to view an upcoming talent in the intimate atmosphere of the Iron Horse, a perfect setting.

No, Bettie Serveert is not a singer. The name defined means, "Bettie served" taken from the title of a Dutch tennis instructional book. At the time of the name's inception, it seemed humorous, but while the band now at times regrets their decision to use this name, they have achieved a status far beyond their expectations and have no choice but to keep it.

With their debut release, Palomine (Matador Records), Bettie Serveert constructs sober, appealing melodies for a wispy yet assertive backdrop. Carol van Dijk's composed and passionate vocals complement the formula perfectly. Her lyrics and intonation permeate soul while remaining intimate. The culmination of van Dijk and the melodies is truly soothing.

If you didn't catch the foursome in Boston recently with indie favorites Superchunk, you have a shot at redemption thanks to this opportunistic staging by the Iron Horse. Bettie Serveert promises an evening of aural appeasement.

Amsterdam's Bettie Serveert take the stage at Iron Horse tonight at 10:00 p.m. Doors open at 9:30 p.m. with tickets available for $6 at the Northampton Box Office or at the door.

Campus Man goes green

Isn't it funny the way things work in this world? We are constantly placing importance on stupid days like in the Midwest where they have a Sweethearts day; which in reality is just another way for the card companies that invented it to make some more profits. Woman. Ofcourse they deserve a lot and even the past elections made use of the 'Year of the Woman' hype.

Adam Scott
ROBERTS

The Oscars celebrated women in film even though this was the worst year for women in film. Go figure. Earth. This is my personal favorite. Every spring we have an earth day. Don't ya think the earth deserves a little more than a day. Come on, it's a big place and we should spend more time protecting it, because after all it is our home.

Granola-Crunchies think wearing their Birkenstocks are doing the world a favor and they all think that Marijuana should be legalized when in reality they are the one's polluting and destructing our world's rain forests to get their specially grown treat. Fine. The elite upperclass aren't helping by strutting around Manhattan and Seattle in their furs but, hey, at least they donate to the World Wildlife Fund. Whatever it is, no one's perfect.

People are hypocrites. One day a year they decide to recycle or walk to celebrate earth which is great. However, it can be made part of one's daily routine easily. Just enter any classroom here at UMass and you'll find those green and blue (earthy-colored) recycling bins. Even in the dorms their are bins for yesterday's Cosmo or Sports Illustrated to be recycled. There's even a bin to recycle your empty laundry detergent or those empty bottles of Snapple.

Look on the bottom of your shampoo bottle — I can almost guarantee it's recyclable just like those empty tuna cans. I can't remember where I heard what I'm going to mention next but I know it's part masterful Blue Velvet he has managed to pull the viewer into a taut web of life's grotesques, but this prequel to collaborators Mark Frost and Lynch's intriguing television series of the same name only reveals that Lynch has lost track of his darker image of Americana and has resorted to his flashes of the macarbe just to bewilder the viewer. Telling the story of Twin Peak's prom queen Laura Palmer's descent into hell via her last seven days alive, Lynch trots out the the usual rogue's gallery of eccentricities and quasi-symbolic devices leaving the film teeming with red herrings. This is not the film that one would expect as a fitting precursor to a truly innovative series. D-

The Big Chill — Writer/Director Lawerence Kasdan (Grand Canyon) focuses on the intersecting lives of the baby boom generation in this small film about an unorthodox reunion among friends who meet to reminisce about past experiences following the suicide of their mutual friend. What follows is an often funny and poignant exhibition of the bonds between friends. Kasdan regular Kevin Kline leads the ensemble cast, which also includes Jeff Goldblum and Glenn Close. Definitely worth seeing twice. B+ of popular culture. The Three R's. Reduce. Reuse. Recycle.

Also playing this week but not reviewed are Prelude to a Kiss, Pygmalion, Afraid of the Dark, Black Moon Rising, Compromising Positions, Crazy People, Deep Star Six, Elephant Man, Ghostbusters, A League of their Own, Little Darlings, Modern Girls, Ferris Bueller's Day Off and The Naked Gun 2 1/2.

So as the so-called environmentalists start to make themselves present by preaching at the Campus Center steps, remember every day is Earth Day. One day a year by far is by no means enough, but I guess it's a start. However, I do remember ironically that in Boston last year a celebration for Earth Day was clouded by the aftermath of plenty of rubbish left along Boston's Esplanade. Isn't is funny that the same people preaching the earth-first philosophy are also the same people making a mess on the day they called Earth Day. As the song supposedly goes "We got the whole world in our hands. . ." We just have to make sure we don't let it slip out of our hands.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Make the most of recent financial gains. Shrewd investments will bring lasting returns. A creative project gets the green light. Pressure mounts when career demands conflict.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You have lot to say today. Steer clear of discussing politics in the workplace. It would be good to find employment soon so you can purchase an automobile for the warm months.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): You have a great deal to be proud of. Your high ideals win out even when they complicate your life. Let others know how important self-respect is for peace of mind.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): You know what a rare talent you have. Let your work speak for itself. You are blessed with a great deal of common sense. Act confident of success and your reputation will grow.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Take steps to prevent future mishaps around the house. Your ideas regarding the younger generation are right on target. Be patient. Better communication is the key.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Use the phone and mail to introduce yourself to people. Linking up with an old friend or former colleague could lead to a lucky new alliance. Be diplomatic when making suggestions.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Long-term alliances and agreements enjoy favorable auspices now. Look to the future with hope. A private meeting with someone influential may be necessary.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A good day to stay on the well-trodden track. Career success stems from sure moves and reliable information. Romance or a special event demands you look your best tonight.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): VIPs will accept your viewpoint and authorize expenses today. The money picture continues to improve. Events at a distance solidify your travel plans.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Do not betray your ideals in the mad dash for financial gain. Link up with partners whose talents or interests complement your own. Lessons learned in the past still come in handy.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): You may feel irritable and disinclined to take any nonsense at home. Be tactful but firm when dealing with relatives. Socializing with intellectual types may be more fun than anticipated.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Romance comes into play today. You seem to know all the right words to say! A brainstorming session helps you solve a recurring problem. Your loyalty and sense of fair play are widely admired.

O'Brien. "We probably met every one of the objectives we set out to meet."

The team travels to Hanover, New Hampshire this weekend to compete in the Dartmouth Invitational meet. After last weekend success, the Minutemen look to be successful.

"The faces and uniforms will be different, but the level of competition will be the same," O'Brien said.

O'Brien plans to move people around in different events to "develop strengths." His goals also include polishing the relay and getting the "competitive routine worked out."

Gorillas set to face off against Crimson

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

Few 1-6 men's lacrosse teams play as well as the Harvard Crimson do — especially when they face the University of Massachusetts.

Case in point: last season the unranked and unrespected Crimson came to Garber Field and nearly walked away with an upset victory. Had it not been for a game-tying goal by Mark Millon with 35 seconds left, the Gorillas wouldn't have pulled out the 8-7 overtime victory.

Which brings us to this afternoon's game in Cambridge, where the 6-2, 10th-ranked Gorillas will face off against their preppier neighbors from the east, continuing what has become one of UMass' most spirited rivalries.

"We're second in New England and they're not ranked, but when UMass and Harvard play you can throw out the rankings and the freakin' record books," UMass coach Ted Garber said. "It's a great rivalry."

The Crimson's 1-6 record is not a fair indication of how well they can play. They were down 6-4 at the half against second-ranked Princeton before being blown out 16-5. They also played Duke closely at the Hofstra Spring Shootout, where UMass players and coaches were able to get a first-hand look at the Crimson's physical, deliberate style of play.

To put it mildly, Harvard lacrosse ain't pretty. The Crimson check hard and often and play a deliberate slow-down offense when possible. But they have good athletes at the skill positions, such as Mike Eckert (9 goals, 9 assists), Steve Gaffney (9-8) and James Ames, who has only 8 scores but is a physical presence around the crease.

Harvard also benefits from the goaltending of Matt Camp, who has a 3 save-per-game average.

"They're an opportunistic team," Garber said. "They'll take whatever you give 'em. They slow it down and work the ball around and try to take what they give you."

However, Camp also allows 13 goals per start, and the Gorillas have yet to lose a game in which they scored 10 or more goals. It would behoove UMass to get on the board early and often to keep Harvard from dragging the game into a slow, sloppy, physical contest, according to Garber.

"Any goals we get early would be a big help," Garber said. "We've gotta start putting the ball in the net when we get opportunities in the first half so we don't put so much pressure on our defense."

For the Gorillas, Mark Millon looks to bounce back from an atypical 1-goal, 1-assist performance against Delaware. The senior leads UMass with 34 goals and 14 assists (48 points). Wes Depp, who has become a serious goal-scoring threat (21 goals, three games with four or more) has been nursing a sore shoulder but should start.

In goal, Tom LoPresti has emerged as the hot goaltender of late, starting both games after last Saturday's stellar second-half performance against Yale. But Garber said he hasn't decided to name one starter.

"It depends on the situation," he said. "Rip Correnti was hot early in the season and LoPresti got hot later. Our other goalie, Morgan Stanford, he's right up there, too — he could go in," he said.

Baseball explodes for big win

By ANTHONY GUIDO
Collegian Staff

Talk about fireworks!

The University of Massachusetts baseball team exploded against Central Connecticut State yesterday for a 32-11 victory. The demolition broke the all-time UMass record for runs scored and upped UMass' record to 9-15.

Third baseman Steve Corradi led the onslaught by going six for six with four singles, a double, a triple and four runs batted in.

Shortstop Greg LaRocca went four for five and made several outstanding plays in the field, turning two double plays and ranging deep in the hole several times.

Designated hitter Justin Kelly, previously hitless on the season, had three RBI's, including a mammoth home run in the sixth inning. Right Fielder Justin Howard had four RBI's with a couple of doubles.

The leading RBI man was Bill Knight, the first baseman, with six, while going three for four. Josh Tobin made his debut with a bullet to the centerfield wall, scoring two.

The cause of all the Minuteman offense was the awful pitching of the Blue Devils. It wasn't all the fault of the pitchers, as the Blue Devils set their own school record by commiting nine errors.

The starter for Central was Jerry Hasler, who got bombed for nine runs on eight hits in one and a third innings, taking the loss.

Todd Salois relieved and gave up 12 runs in three innings pitched. None of the other relievers fared any better.

The UMass pitchers did not fare well either. John Alves, making his starting debut, got rocked for three runs on nine hits in two and a third innings.

Reliever Lorne Levy picked up the win pitching four and a third innings giving up six runs. Greg Dowd mopped up for the Minutemen.

Fiery George Redman, the head coach for Central Connecticut State, asked UMass head coach Mike Stone to end the torture after seven innings and mercifully the three-hour game was over.

UMass had batted around in three different innings, taking advantage of sloppy Blue Devil defense and wild pitching.

The Minutemen hope they saved some offense as they next travel down to Hartford tomorrow, and then host Atlantic 10 rival St. Bonaventure for a three-game series Saturday and Sunday.

Minutemen perform well in Classic

By MATTHEW VAUTOUR
Collegian Staff

Strong performances and good weather were the order of the day for the University of Massachusetts men's track team last weekend at the annual Holy Cross Classic invitational track meet.

The three-day meet started with two days of decathlon and finishes with regular competition on the final day.

The performance of decathletes Paul Doyle and Joe Kourafas set the tone for the entire weekend for UMass. Despite having what he described as a "disappointing first day," Doyle completed the decathlon with his best-ever second day of competition to place third overall with a score of 6174.

Kourafas, who finished first last year, finished in the top five for the second straight year, placing fifth with a score of 5811. The performance of both decathletes qualified them for the New England Championships.

The first event on Saturday was the 10,000 meters. In their first time competing in the event, Ted Towse and Tim Boilard finished first and second.

"We continued the start that Paul [Doyle] and Joe [Kourafas] provided," coach Ken O'Brien said.

Lyonel Benjamin took first place in a tight race in the 100 meter finals with a time of 11.0 seconds, while sophomore sensation Tom Galligani continued his dominance in the triple jump taking first place as well.

The steeplechase is considered by many to be track and field's most difficult event. Rick Copley, in his first-ever steeplechase, finished third overall. He bested the top time by a first time steeplechaser by twenty seconds.

Despite not having all the top sprinters in the event, the 4x100 meter relay team improved their season best time by two seconds and finished fourth

Also contributing strong performances for the Minutemen, were John Johnson (2nd in Long Jump), Kevin Greenhalgh (3rd in 5000 meters), Marc LeFebvre (3rd Shot put), and freshmen Rich Dupuis and Mike Masone (5th and 6th in Javelin).

O'Brien's goal going into the meet was to have 10 individuals qualify for the New England Championships. Seven Minutemen qualified for the first time, joining the three who already had.

"We had strong representation across the board," said a pleased

Hank Aaron; 755 home runs, Babe Ruth; 714 home runs, and University of Massachusetts senior catcher Sherri Kuchinskas; 11.

Though Kuchinskas trails a great deal in numbers, she joined the ranks of the immortals yesterday, blasting her third home run of the year in the bottom of the first inning of game one, moving her into first place on the all-time UMass list and helping the Minutewomen to a sweep of Central Connecticut doubleheader (10-0; 8-0) at Totman field.

"Someone told me I was only one (home run) away this morning," said a modest Kuchinskas. "As soon as I hit it I knew it was out. The pitch was right down the middle and that sucker was just asking for it."

Overall, UMass, coming off a perfect 4-0 weekend, continued their high level of play in every phase of the game, proving Central Connecticut to be nothing but a crumbling building for the Minutewomen's "wrecking ball" tactics.

"Today was good in all aspects," head coach Elaine Sortino said. "Offensively, we put it together and hit when we had to and, again the pitching was solid."

After Kuchinskas' (2-for-3 with 2 runs batted in) home run in the first-inning with one man on, giving UMass a 2-0 lead, her teammates followed the example and ran off eight runs on eight hits.

Aside from Kuchinskas record-breaking game, UMass sported their usual well-rounded box score, which found Heather Dorsey (3-for-4), Michelle Shaw (3-for-4 with one RBI), Jenn Salisbury (2-for-4 with four RBI) all throwing in stellar performances.

Game Two saw the same from UMass at the plate, including a seven run second-inning, backed by two-run single from Salsibury (1-for-2) and more heroics from Kuchinskas (1-for-2) with a three run double.

From the mound, it was Darlene Claffey picking up her sixth win in seven starts, with Dana Colia pitching four near-perfect innings in relief.

Scott's shots

Bring on the Braves. Call the White House, the Sox will be visiting in October. Roll out the barrel, we're having a barrel of fun.

• Welcome to Amherst, Joe Mallen, and allow me to be the first to call your new home, the "Mallen's Center."

However, we're a bit curious why your introductory press conference as the UMass hockey coach was held on a Saturday afternoon during one of the busiest weekends in Boston sports.

David
SCOTT

Starting a new program would seem to require the utmost in visibility. Naming your coach on the weekend of the Boston Marathon, the Bruins first playoff game and in the midst of the hysteria of the Red Sox first homestand may have been an error in judgment. Don't let this be a sign of things to come.

• (Three paragraphs on hockey? Scott must have sun poisoning.)

• The Fenway opener is arguably the greatest day of the year. With some hesitation I'll admit that Boston Garden must come down, but to destroy Fenway would be mistake of enormous proportion.

They've already erred in replacing most of the bathtub urinals in the men's room with the individual models. Let the tragedy stop there.

• Give John Calipari and his staff credit for their recruiting. Gale Catlett, the amiable (to his mother perhaps) coach at West Virginia has just signed only its second recruit for the upcoming season (a 6-foot-4, 205-pound! guard!). Maybe a bit late, Gale? We've already been talking about Camby, Weeks, Travieso and Padilla for months. The early bird catches the worm.

• A round of applause for Tammy Marshall please.

• Despite dropping two of three in Morgantown this past weekend, The UMass baseball team showed glimpses of brilliance. Steve "The" Corradi "Kid" showed some impressive pop in his bat including, a two-run dinger to deep center on Sunday. Jay Murphy pitched well and despite the loss, so did Jeff Toothaker.

[bullet] If ever in Morgantown, avoid Rugby parties on muddy hills, eat at Shoney's and when the guy next to you tells a girl she's wearing a beautiful smock — exit the bar.

• Earl Lorden Field is in remarkably good shape and the grounds crew deserves a serious pat on the back. Joe Mooney eat your heart out.

• How about the pinch hitting job of "Wetzels' Pretzels" in this space a couple of weeks back. The kid could have future if only he lived in the 'Gue and had a dog named Bo.

UMass, students clash over chalk graffiti

By MELANIE DESILVA
Collegian Staff

Late Tuesday night into Wednesday morning, several gay, lesbian and bisexual students, heterosexual allies and campus visitors, were confronted by Campus Center staff, Public Safety and University Police for chalking the front of the Student Union with slogans, symbols and passionate calls for equal rights.

According to Woolwich, the chalking was meant to serve an educational and supportive role, publicizing the National March on Washington for GLB rights happening this Sunday, and letting closeted students know that there is a strong community base to help them come out.

"It's time for our invisibility to end," activist Ali Woolwich told the Collegian reporter present. "Visibility action lets people know that we're here and that we deserve respect and equal rights like all other American citizens."

On their hands and knees in cool, windy night air, participants drew lesbian and gay symbols, triangles, and phrases such as "Homophobia Sucks," "We are everywhere," "One in 10 are gay. Deal with it," and "Love is love is love."

Nearly all the chalk marks were washed away almost immediately by campus personnel.

Dean of Students Jo-anne Vanin said chalkings, regardless of their intentions, are still a violation of the University's anti-graffiti policy.

"It falls under defacing of property. It's a violation of University policy," said Vanin, who has yet to see the police report on the incident.

The chalking was disrupted when Charles Lehane, the Campus Center night manager, confronted partici-

UCLA praises candidate

Mitchell-Kernan lauded as approachable

Editor's note: This is the second of a two-part series on the chancellorship finalists.

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL

Claudia I. Mitchell-Kernan, one of the two University of Massachusetts chancellorship finalists, welcomes suggestions and gives initial attention to what she thinks are good ideas, say those who work with her at the University of California at Los Angeles.

Describing Mitchell-Kernan as "definitely approachable," Peary Brug, internal vice-president of the graduate student government, said Mitchell-Kernan makes sure to attend the Graduate Student Association forum once a year and the student affairs breakfast seven to nine times a year.

Mitchell-Kernan, the dean and vice chancellor of graduate programs at UCLA since 1989, is responsible for enacting policies created by the UCLA Graduate Council, a body of 18 faculty and students.

"I like her. Personally, she is a nice person," said Brug, who praised Mitchell-Kernan's support for student power in campus affairs.

In UCLA's current search for a School of Mathematics and Physical Sciences dean, Brug said Mitchell-Kernan backed student representatives who wanted to screen the dean candidates themselves.

Brug also credited Mitchell-Kernan with being calm under pressure, describing her efforts to ease tensions after an article in Nommo News, UCLA's African-American magazine, was found by some to be anti-Semetic.

Mitchell-Kernan didn't have to intercede the situation falling under the vice-chancellor for student affairs' jurisdiction,

Trust fund shake-up set up to increase student control

Editor's note: This is the first of a two-part series on the reorganization of the University's Division of Student Activities.

By ALYSSA M. OWENS
Collegian Staff

The Student Activities Trust Fund, currently used to pay for the Student Activities Office's operating costs, will be used solely to fund student programs, agencies and businesses following Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Tom Robinson's reorganization of the University's Divison of Student Activities.

The SAO, primarily an adminstrative office, serves in an advisory capacity to student organizations as well as providing student groups with a structural base, according to SAO Business Manager Alan Bainerd

Undergraduate Student Senate officials, who have worked with the SAO dividing trust fund money among campus organizations, have widely embraced Robinson's decision for the reorganization.

"I see this as an ushering in of a new era for student government and student empowerment on campus," said former speaker Mike Poster.

Poster said the reorganization will bring financial benefits and more autonomy to student government and other activities at the University.

Child of Holocaust survivor shares self-discovery

By LISA GREENFIELD
Collegian Staff

Storyteller Lisa Lipkin shared her candid, and sometimes humorous, reflections of growing up as the child of a Holocaust survivor with an audience in Hillel House Tuesday night as part of the University's Holocaust Memorial Week.

Lipkin studied at the American Academy of Dramatic Arts in New York City, as well as at the Royal Acadamy of Dramatic Arts in London. She said her acting has been primarily character portrayals and, "It's not a coincidence playing other parts and not myself. Now this performance has become cathartic."

Three years ago, she said she joined a therapy group for children of Holocaust survivors in what she described as her way of facing the feelings she had about being a survivor. She said it was this experience of sharing with this group that inspired her to go into theater because, "Theatre would be a great place to express it."

She told mostly about her mother, who was from Czechoslovakia and was reluctant to talk about the Holocaust. Lipkin said when she would ask her mother about being a survivor her mother would "turn away and say something about anything else."

Inmates give up prison uprising

By JERI WATERS
Associated Press

LUCASVILLE, Ohio — All five guards still held hostage during a state prison siege were released Wednesday night as scores of inmates surrendered and the 11-day standoff neared an end.

Seven inmates and one hostage died in the uprising at the Southern Ohio Correctional Facility.

The five guards were released shortly before 10:30 p.m., said Jim Mayers of the state Department of Rehabilitation and Correction.

Roughly seven hours earlier, the first of 450 barricaded inmates began giving up. Late Wednesday night inmates were coming out of their cellblock in groups of 60 to 80.

The inmates had taken eight guards hostage. One guard was strangled and two were freed unharmed last week.

About 185 inmates had surrendered by about 9:30 p.m., roughly six hours after the first prisoners gave up. Born said about five inmates apparently were supervising the others in the maximum-security Southern Ohio Correctional Facility.

In exchange for peaceful surrender, state officials promised to review the inmates' complaints, including religious objections to tuberculosis testing and a federal law that requires integration of prison cells.

Three of the prisoners were carried out of barricaded Cellblock L on stretchers; three used crutches.

Some of the others were handcuffed, other carried large bags with their belongings as they walked through a courtyard guarded by a line of armed officers. The inmates were taken to a gymnasium in an adjacent cellblock where they were identified, searched and given a new set of clothes, Born said.

By late afternoon, 30 inmates had been escorted out of Cellblock L. They were led out one at a time and some were carried out on stretchers.

In exchange for the peaceful surrender, state officials promised to review the inmates' complaints, including religious objections to tuberculosis testing and a federal law that requires integration of prison cells.

The surrender was witnessed by religious leaders and the news media. Throughout the standoff, inmates demanded that the media witness a surrender in an attempt to discourage authorities from retalitating.

"This entire ordeal has been an incredible experience for us all," Warden Arthur Tate said. "Nevertheless, I am extremely proud thus far at the manner in which everyone has joined together in an attempt to bring this tragic ordeal to a successful conclusion."

On Tuesday, three inmates and state negotiators met face-to-face for the first time, talking for two hours from opposite sides of a chain-link fence. Niki Schwartz, an inmate-rights lawyer who was brought to the prison Sunday by state officials, also took part.

"We are thrilled to announce the peaceful resolution of this crisis," Schwartz said.

The Cleveland lawyer gave out a list of 21 terms of surrender that had been signed by the warden. The terms included a promise of no retaliation against inmates, but Tate did not rule out prosecution or discipline.

"The inmates understand that when a guard has been murdered, noone is going to promise them no prosecution or discipline," he said.

Other terms included a promise to consult with prisoners on tuberculosis testing, which some Muslim prisoners had objected to on religious grounds; and review of some other prison rules, such as forced racial integration of cells.

Prisoners had originally demanded other steps, including Tate's removal as warden.

Red (Sox) Faced

As long as the first place Boston Red Sox are rolling along, proving the skeptics wrong, all fans of the Olde Towne Team should take time to ridicule those experts who doubted Mssrs. Clemens, et al.

Today, we shine the light on The Pitt News' Editor in Chief Jason Hillman, who, in his infinite wisdom, predicted Hobson's Boys would finish in the cellar of the American League East. Here is Hillman's take on the Sox:

"A once-proud organization, the Boston Red Sox is probably the only team that can be completely counted out of the pennant race. They have Roger Clemens and very little else. . . Frank Viola is still a good pitcher, but otherwise this team is really not worth talking about."

Not worth talking about? Very little else? Try 11-3

Hillman will believe when Mo Vaughn takes the triple crown this year and John Dopson finishes 21-4 with 13 shutouts.

Pennant fever has already struck.

Shoe-in

The bizarre crime of the week comes from the Arizona Daily Wildcat, the student newspaper of the University of Arizona.

Apparently a female UA student was studying in the library on a Thursday afternoon, when she decided to take off her shoes. After about an hour, a man sitting from her at a table asked her "Where's your other shoe? You had two of them a short while ago."

The woman inspected under the table and discovered that, indeed one of her shoes was now missing. A little spooked, the woman began to gather her things to leave, but the man asked, "Do you have far to go? I can carry you on my back."

The woman did not reply so the man offered her his shoes but said, "I think they're too big anyway."

The woman then departed the area and found a librarian in the lobby, who contacted the local authorities. The police said the man is the chief suspect in the case.

Now, this is either a cheezy way of picking up women or this man masterminds an intense, one-shoe thieving, crime ring. Either way, the moral of the story is, stay out of the library at all costs.

Drugged out

A study by Michigan State University found that drug and alcohol use among junior high school and high school students continues to drop.

The study polled over 50,000 eighth, 10th and 12th graders from throughout the country and found that while today's eighth graders are experimenting more with drugs than in 1991, drug use among older students is down.

Nearly 22 percent of high school seniors reported to using marijuana, down two percent from 1991. More than 7 percent of eighth graders smoked dope, up one percent from 1991.

Alcohol consumption is also down. Only 27.9 percent of seniors reported consuming five or more drinks a week, down from 29.9 percent in 1991.

However, LSD use is up slightly among young people. Five and a half percent of the seniors and 2.1 percent of the eighth graders have tried the drug, up from 5.2 percent and 1.7 percent respectively in 1991.

Llyod Johnson, the study's principal investigator, said the news is encouraging but the nation can not afford to relax its war on drugs.

"The country has sort of gone into cruise control in dealing with drug issues," Johnson said. "We can't take these improvements for granted."

Don't mess with Texas

Residents of the Lone Star State have always taken heart in the fact that their state, Texas, is the only state in the United States, which can legally secede from the union.

Evan Fitzmaurice, a columnist for The Daily Texan, the student newspaper at the University of Texas, claims Texans should consider actually using their right to leave the country.

Fitzmaurice claims that Texas, "With it's remarkable defense, energy, mineral, agricultural, coastal and industrial assets could be a formidable power without membership in the union."

Likewise Texas supplies "Meat, cotton, rice, power, football, guns and butter to the rest of the country."

The only thing Texas needs in order to secede, according to Fitzmaurice, is to remove Gov. Ann Richards and put George Bush in as president.

Spring brings more than exams as campus blooms in full color

Editor's note: This is the second in a series of articles on Signs of Spring here at UMass

Greenhouse manager Tom Beauchese and assistant manager Cindy Rumgdom work outside a greenhouse near the Franklin Dining Commons.

A soft breeze blows through the garden, gently swaying a collection of brightly colored daffodils. The warmth of the spring sun brings with it the promise of a new awakening. The landscape erupts into a canvas of brilliant colors, showcasing all of nature's beauty in one gigantic sideshow: the Spring Bloom.

Here at the University of Massachusetts, we have the privilege of living and working on a campus which is officially classified as an arboretum, a place for the study and exhibition of trees.

According to John Tristan, director of the Durfee Conservatory, the Conservatory was the original site of the center of the arboretum.

"This is a unique area of campus," Tristan said. Most of the exotic and foreign tree species are located in and around the Conservatory. It was one of the first four original structures built on the UMass campus in 1867. Its greenhouse contains five rooms, each filled with different plant varieties.

But trees aren't the only things budding this time of year. There are a myriad of smaller flowering bushes and plants to see on campus. Susan Mulgrew, a professor in the department of plant and soil sciences, described one of the more common species, the rhododendron.

Diapers decorate Student Union

Children, motherhood subjects of week-long exhibit

By KRISTEN LANS
Collegian Staff

Kids, toys, quilts and diapers are on the scene at the Student Union Gallery this week as a part of Kathleen Anderson's Thesis Show titled "Babies Making Mothers."

"She made me into a mother," said Anderson about the title. "Her life had just started so it didn't change her. But she redefined who I am."

Anderson, a 42-year-old graduate student at the University and her daughter Jayme, 8, are at the gallery from 8 a.m. to 11 p.m. each day.

Anderson has invited student and faculty mothers to leave their children at the gallery while they attend classes.

"Women have said to me that this is the first time in their professional life when it's been appropriate to have their child with them," Anderson said.

Anderson said splits occur in what her professional life demands of her and what her life as a mother demands of her.

"A woman is automatically divided into two people by her professional life and motherhood."

Anderson said she wanted to live in the gallery 24 hours a day with her daughter during the exhibit but was denied by the UMass Arts Council who was sponsoring the exhibit. She said because she needed the money from the Arts Council she did not contest their restriction.

"They would let me stay here but it is Jayme they objected to," Anderson said. "There is no separation between where my art happens and where by life happens."

She said she wanted Jayme's presence in the exhibit and scheduled it during a week that Jayme is on school vacation.

According to Anderson they currently live on welfare but that it is a step above the five weeks that she and Jayme were homeless last year.

"We are poor in terms of money," Anderson said. "But in terms of education we are wealthy and that is not an option that a lot of people have."

Anderson said art is a racist, classist and elite occupation and she is trying to transmit a different message by her exhibit.

"Art when it is just on the walls in a gallery is not OK to me," Anderson said. "It should not be individual."

She arranged for the public to be involved in discussions held every noon in the gallery. Speakers are also scheduled every evening at 7 p.m. At Wednesdays noon discussion, "Not Eating", Anderson invited women to speak and perform their feelings about food.

"Women medicate their feelings away with food," Anderson said. "We try to get our bodies ready for people to be in love with us and eating messes that up."

Anderson said food affects all women in a strong way and it begins at a young age. She said Jayme and her friends in second grade already talk about dieting.

Anderson said she has had mixed reaction from classes which come to look at her art. Some students have told her that toys are not art and kids don't belong in the exhibit.

"Lots of boys have real problems that kids are here," Anderson said. "The exhibit is a mother's experience."

Irish journalists claim change needed for Ireland to compete

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

Two Irish journalists said Ireland needs to reform both economically and socially if it is to become part of the "new European Community" in a speech at Memorial Hall Tuesday night.

The two speakers were Brendan Keenan, the financial editor for the Irish Independent, and Nuala O'Faolian, a columnist for the Irish Times. Keenan said Ireland must develop new industry and attract foreign technical expertise if it is to compete in the "new European market."

Keenan said in order for Ireland to be competitive in European single market, Ireland needs to create industries that produce specific products for larger companies, such as machine parts or special plastics. He also said Irish companies need to find ways to improve their technology relative to their competitors.

"Irish companies typically make standard, low technology products," Keenan said. "While we cannot manufacture [personal computers], I see no reason why we can't produce systems for PCs."

Keenan said many students leave for the United States because they cannot get the training they need for technical careers. He said Ireland must encourage its students to stay home, and entice foreigners with technical experience to work in Ireland.

Columnist O'Faolain has been called the "voice of Irish women." She said the status of Irish women has not improved much in the past 20 years.

"The feminist movement in America has focused on individual and civil rights," she said. "In Ireland we have a weak notion of that. Women in Ireland have been satisfied with sorrow and self-pity."

O'Faolain said only recently has the Irish government allowed women to legally obtain information about contraception and allowed teenage girls to go to England to receive abortions. She also said despite recent accomplishments, such as Mary Robinson being elected to the symbolic position of Irish President, overall conditions for women have not greatly improved.

"We are no closer to being able to walk down the street at night without being afraid of the footsteps behind us," she said. "I have my job at the whim of a man."

O'Faolain also said the advances women have won have been the result of the Irish judicial system rather than the efforts of male politicians.

"You would be hard pressed to find anything [Irish] men have done in the past 20 years that resembles social progress," she said.

Student gov't deadlocks over Yom Kippur issue

By ALYSSA M. OWENS
Collegian Staff

A bid to promote a proposal to close the University during Yom Kippur with a motion by the Undergraduate Student Senate will have to wait another week, after the Senate deadlocked over the issue last night.

Following a heated debate, the Senate vote on the motion was 21 for and 13 against, with nine abstentions.

Proponents of the motion were initially victorious, until it was discovered that more people had voted "not for" the motion, negatively or abstaining, than had voted in favor of it. The motion was, subsequently, not passed.

A motion to reconsider the issue next week passed, but reconsideration was postponed because of a lack of senators.

Sen. Alan Weinfeld, who introduced the Yom Kippur motion, argued vehemently for the motion's passage. He cited failure of faculty and administration to respect students' religious observance of Yom Kippur as a key reason for the change.

"Jewish students have failed exams [given on Yom Kippur] for not showing up and have been harassed by professors," said Weinfeld, noting that the University has a policy which excuses students from class for religious observation.

Weinfeld said the policy has been widely ignored, and claimed one professor called it "silly."

Over 3,400 of the University's students are Jewish, he said.

To close the University on Yom Kippur would send a message to faculty and administration to respect the right for religious observation, Weinfeld said.

Senators engaged in debate on the issue, some saying that its passage would only result in an outcry for the University's closing on other religious holidays.

Enforcement of the University's current policy should be sought instead, argued some Senate members.

The Senate voted to accept Chancellor Richard O'Brien's proposal for making the University a smoke-free campus 32 for and 12 against, with smoking being banned in all public and individual work areas.

Smoking would only be allowed in certain Campus Center Hotel rooms, areas within the dormitories and "the outdoors," said Sen. Erin Jackson, chair of the Senate's public policy committee.

The Senate's acceptance of the proposal, backed by President David Nuñez, follows votes on the issue by the Faculty Senate, which accepted it, and the Graduate Student Senate, which rejected it.

O'Brien will make the final decision, Jackson said.

Earthday events scheduled for today at Campus Pond

By FRANCIS ZERA
Collegian Staff

The Earthday Coalition, in conjunction with the Housing Services Recycling Program and MassPIRG, will celebrate Earth Day 1993 with a series of events and activities today from 10 a.m. to 7 p.m. on the Campus Pond lawn.

The main event will be a public forum entitled "The Earth Day Affair, The Exciting Environmental Talk Show," held from 4 p.m. to 6 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom. Panelists will discuss the pending Endangered Species Act and the issues surrounding the disposal of low-level nuclear waste, according to Earthday Coalition Coordinator Robin Purnell.

Wildlife biology professor, Curtice Griffin, and resource economics professor, Thomas Stevens, will discuss the Endangered Species Act and the conflict between wildlife protection and economic interests. Professor Gerald Peterson, from the department of physics and astronomy, and Dale MacLeod, from the Citizen's Awareness Network will discuss the disposal of low-level nuclear waste.

Scheduled events include information tables from over 25 organizations, including Project Learning Tree, the Hitchcock Center for the Environment, the Arcadia Wildlife Sanctary, and the Community Service Council.

The UMass Parachuting Club will also drop by at noon, weather permitting. Other activities will include face painting, T-shirt tie-dying, Earth Volleyball and a raffle. The grand prize is a 10-speed bicycle donated by Valley Bicycle.

Purnell said that in case of rain, all events will take place in the Student Union Ballroom and the parachute jump will be cancelled.

but Brug said Mitchell-Kernan was willing to talk to students regardless.

Adding that Mitchell-Kernan has been interested in multicultural affairs, Brug said she has tried to diversify the faculty by working with departments to hire more minority professors.

But Brug charged that Mitchell-Kernan may not have been aggressive enough in pursuing graduate issues, preferring instead to go with the administrative status quo.

"We feel she is not aggressive enough. . . She tends to go with the flow of things. She is not a mover or shaker," Brug said. "She says really good things, but I am curious if she is going to deliver."

Holly Brewer, a student representative to the Graduate Council, said Mitchell-Kernan tends to support practices already in place. But that may be a good thing, she said.

"If you present it clearly enough, it will get through," said Brewer, a history graduate student. "She listens to positive proposals. . . with solutions."

Emil Volcheck, GSA's commissioner of academic affairs, said Mitchell-Kernan failed to follow through on a project meant to gather data on graduate enrollment after she promised last year the work would be done through the graduate division. Volcheck, a mathematics graduate student, said Mitchell-Kernan did not follow through, and very little data has been gathered.

But Volcheck said Mitchell-Kernan helped teaching assistants get half of their fees paid for by either the U.S. government or UCLA's Graduate Division Trust Fund. And according to Brewer, UCLA now pays for graduate students' medical care, thanks to Mitchell-Kernan.

Lipkin said she realized later that her mother "just couldn't talk about it."

Although Lipkin remembers talking about her hopes and dreams as a child, she said she always acted like her mother had taught her.

"Don't dream, dreams will be shattered. . . evil lurks around every corner," Lipkin said.

Lipkin said the Holocaust made her family fearful of future persecution, causing them to attempt to "fit in with other Americans" and avoid being seen as Jewish by naming their daughter Lisa, a common American name, keeping all charitable donations anonymous, keeping all of their political affiliations secret.

Dreams came up again when Lipkin explained she was "different from all the other kids."

"They were all dreaming of the future and I was dreaming of the past, the past of other people and the past of my mother," she said.

After class, Lipkin would imagine an invasion of the Nazis and how she would "act around the Nazis. I would practice outwitting them."

At some point in her childhood Lipkin said she thought her parents weren't normal. She thought her mother was obsessed with food. Her mother would "freeze more food that we could ever eat." After she had thrown away a frozen chicken that had green mold in its head, Lipkin said she found out later that her mother had actually stored money in the head, because, "You never know when it can all be taken away."

"Everything was a metaphor for survival, even in suburban New Jersey," Lipkin said.

Everyday things, Lipkin said, would emerge as horror on her mother's face. New Jersey's ugly, grey smoke stacks reminded her of the smoke rising from the crematoriums. A leftover half of a sandwich in a restaurant reminded her of a incident in the labor camp where she had been given a half of a sandwich from a laborer and ate it all before realizing she should share it with her sisters.

She said, once stories would slip out by accident, "they would never be mentioned again."

"Part of me wanted to protect her from the pain, but a larger part wanted to hear the stories that were never told to me," Lipkin said.

Lipkin said that a need to find her roots was the motivator for her facing her experiences as a survivor. After her father's mother had died, she said that he gave her a cameo pin that she said she cherished as tangible evidence of her roots.

"Roots were something that connected me. From my mother I could have no objects because everything had been stolen, or so I thought," Lipkin said.

A few years later she was directed to a government warehouse full of possessions recovered and donated by Holocaust survivors. There she found a sweater and kerchief of her aunt's. Upon seeing a tiny child's sweater she said, "I realized my aunt was 12 and my mother was 10" when they were in the camp.

"These objects were larger than life, but on the other hand, they were smaller than I ever imagined," Lipkin said.

After her performance, she encouraged any children of survivors to speak about similarities and differences in their experiences. The audience responded with many personal reflections, prompted by Lipkin's questions. She answered some questions directed to her, but seemed more interested in hearing others share their experiences.

Racist assertions go unchallenged

How is it that not a single voice from the administration or the faculty of UMass was raised publicly to protest the outrageous, racist and sexist attack against the Black woman finalist for chancellor, Claudia Mitchell-Kernan [Collegian, April 2]?

Student columnist Michael Morrissey asserted in his column that a Mitchell-Kernan chancellorship would lead to an influx of unqualified "minority" students, a lowering of standards for the University and an increase in crime. Consequently, since Mitchell-Kernan is thought to be favored, the search for a new Chancellor should be reopened.

Is there a question that these assertions are both racist and sexist? Do you, who read this, believe that to significantly increase the number of students of color on this campus, it would be necessary to lower the University's standards?

Do you believe that such an increase would also increase the incidence of crime? Do you assume that all young people of color are intellectually inferior to you; that all young people of color are more prone to criminal behavior than you? Do you assume because she is Black and a woman that Claudia Mitchell-Kernan would flood the campus with unqualified "minority" freshmen of criminal character?

It is because too many of the administration and faculty of this university believe these assertions that Morrissey's column has gone unchallenged by them. Is it any wonder that Black students and other students on this campus boil with a controlled rage that from time to time breaks out of control? They would be less than human were it not so.

But, they are very human. Despite the "adult" example of the administration and faculty, the majority of students on this campus, Black and White, want to live the spirit of sisterhood (and brotherhood) so eloquently captured on the New York Times Sunday Magazine cover of Jenny and Jamila, co-captains of the Hurricanes, the Amherst Regional High School girls' basketball team.

Members of the Black community, faculty, staff and students, are not the perpetrators of color racism on this campus. We are its objects and its targets. Our actions and our deeds, however rash, are in response to an atmosphere that makes it possible for a student to publicly trash a fine role model, candidate for chancellor of this university, without a hint of protest from her future peers. With civility, diversity, multiculturalism and a healthy respect for ethnicity as our goal, the administration and the faculty have a responsibility to our students, to our university, to our community and to our nation to set an example in the fight against racism and sexism.

Did it have to end this way?

Did it have to end this way?

When I was 8 I recall seeing television news footage of hundreds of coffins arriving from Jonestown, Guyana. It was hard to fathom why these people had all perished, why they had all followed Rev. Jim Jones' order to commit mass-suicide by drinking poisoned Kool-Aid. Death isn't a concept most elementary school kids, or adults for that matter, can comprehend on a personal level.

Greg
SUKIENNIK

That was one of the first things that came to my mind when I saw the charred ruins of what was the Branch Davidians' compound on the outskirts of Waco, Texas. Commentators mentioned it had gone up in flames in 30 minutes and I knew there was no way any of them could have escaped.

Did it have to end this way?

The sight of tanks armed with battering rams tearing holes in a yellow house seemed other-worldly and unreal. Then came thick white smoke and flames, pouring out the windows of the compound. Nobody ran out. Either they couldn't escape fast enough or they were prevented from leaving, but the sight of no one escaping was unnerving and unsettling.

Did they kill themselves? We may never know for sure, but they would have needed a lot of lantern fuel or lighter fluid to set a whole house on fire, even a wooden frame house, and get it to burn so fast. Agents said they saw cult members spreading lantern fuel around the campground, but who's left to say that's true? Is it really just a coincidence that fire trucks didn't arrive until there was nothing left to burn?

The explanations seem too pat, the excuses too easy. "They were a bunch of wackos." A cult. Crazy people. Who would you trust, the FBI or some royally screwed-up pseudo-religion run by a megalomaniac who had dissenters beaten and coerced female followers into having his babies? I don't believe the FBI burned the place down, but the way things are just falling into place is too strange.

Did it have to end this way?

The FBI, believe it or not, is not stupid. They know how cults work and in what patterns they think and operate. Conflicts between good and evil are a built-in feature of most religions but cults exploit this age-old tradition to the fullest. Jim Jones did. So did David Koresh.

If David Koresh was bent on apocalyptic destruction, why did the FBI risk the lives of 24 children and scores of followers who didn't know better anymore? No one was expecting them to wait until Koresh was good and ready, but armored personnel carriers and tear gas? The FBI was asking for the worst and sure enough they got it. Remember Johnny Rambo, the slightly unstable Vietnam War veteran played by Sylvester Stallone in First Blood? He was fine until people started pushing him. Then he pushed back.

Jonestown happened much the same way. Troops piled in, the followers shot back, then did themselves in at Jones' command. Weren't 915 deaths enough of an example?

Say what you want about the Branch Davidians. They were sick, demented, misled. But look past the numbers and the generalizations. These were real people with real families, living the way they had chosen to, for better or for worse. They didn't deserve to burn and choke to death simply because a government agency had lost patience with a madman.

It shouldn't have ended this way.

One is innocent until proven guilty

In the last couple of weeks we have all heard a lot about the tragic and senseless death of Tara Hartnett. I did not know Tara Hartnett, nor James Cyr, her ex-boyfriend and alleged murderer. But the emotional wound of her death cuts more than just her friends and family; in one way or another it affects us all. I think we can all agree that her death was nothing less than genuinely horrible, and that the killer should be painfully punished.

Unfortunately, many people in the Happy Valley seem to want to forget one tiny detail: that in this country a suspect is innocent until proven guilty. It seems that many people have already tried and convicted the suspect, James Cyr, and are all set for a lynching. The fact is no one (to my knowledge) was there to actually witness the crime.

When the case goes to trial and the evidence is examined then we can try to put the pieces together. But for the campus and the valley to engage in self-righteous pontificating and pointless speculation solves nothing. Tara Hartnett's murder was tragic, and if James Cyr is found guilty then we can all join hands and damn him to hell and back again twice. But not before. Until then he is innocent.

The concept of innocent until proven guilty is one that we had all better come to terms with; otherwise, each and every one of us is screwed.

Notes From the Campus Center Basement

WARNING: This, potentially my last Notes from the Campus Center Basement column, because of its high sarcasm content, should be kept away from pets and small children. If swallowed, contact your local poison control center immediately.

Outstanding career opportunity! Be a UMass chancellor! Competitive salary, comprehensive benefits package, free house and nicely carpeted office. Must enjoy large crowds and not mind these large crowds dropping in every now and then to make large, expensive and many times unreasonable demands. Patience with rhetoric and hypocritical symbolism a must. At least two years working in fast food preferred, but will consider those with legislative contacts.

O.K., let me see if I've got this right. The University is going to eliminate the lab fees and then raise the curriculum fee by $75. Why? Because the administration has noticed that lab fees are often charged in classes which do not include labs, they're trying to sort of trim back the tuition and fees name game created for this campus during the "big bad budget bummer." But, ironically, while the University eliminates one Newspeak situation, they're contributing to another, the curriculum fee. What is a curriculum fee? It's tuition! The curriculum fee and tuition pay for exactly the same things. But they're listed twice on our bills. Obviously there has been some mistake, so next semester just ask the bursar to remove one of these charges because you've been asked to pay twice for the same thing. I'm sure they'll appreciate your pointing out their error.

Signs advertising the John Calipari Summer Basketball Camp have appeared around campus. All bow to the god of merchandising. When does the action figure come out? You know, the one with the expanding wallet and the mouth that opens real wide to say, "More, please. Wanna buy a T-shirt?" every time you pull the string on its back?

Typos are an editor's nightmare. Little typing errors sprinkled randomly through an entire edition's worth of text have often threatened to rob many a night editor of his or her sanity. I've had more than my share of embarrassing typo-induced spelling gaffes. From last semester's banner headline with siege spelled "seige," to last week's "Cape Coed Lounge," it has been enough to make my high school English teacher roll over in her grave, that is, if she were dead. Maybe if I used the spell check more often. . . 'Course it's not as bad as this year's faculty phone book where the Organic and Evolutionary Biology Program is listed as the Orgasmic and Evolutionary Biology Program.

Possibly overheard at Saturday's "Extrava-ganja," also know as the big stink in the Student Union: "Honest officer, it's tobacco. See, Marlboro?" Or, "Hey, anybody got a light?"

The only really outstanding advantage to being a senior is the ability to frequent the local taverns thus making you frequently broke.

Heads up UMass! Your professors' love lives may be in danger if a proposed University of Virginia policy finds its way to the Happy Valley. The Charlottesville campus of that state's public university system may ban all romantic overtures, dating, flirting and sex between professors and their students because romantic relationships, according to the policy's authors, are relationships of power. Thus far, the only people backing it are the people on the committee that devised it. And, although he has refused to comment on the potential anti-pubic policy, this writer guesses it won't find much support in the university's president, John T. Casteen. Before becoming Mrs. Casteen, his wife was a graduate student in a class he taught at the University of California at Berkeley during the '70s.

This just in: it has been discovered that the fire which razed the David Koresh Your Life My Camaro Complex was caused accidentally by an Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms agent. Special Agent Gus Kidding was apparently hiding behind the compound smoking a cigarette and drinking grain alcohol while cleaning his firearm. One thing led to another and. . .

Quote from a University of Florida official: "We don't think of [admissions] in terms of revenue. We think of it in terms of access. We only raise what we need to provide access to students." Note: the University of Florida, a state school, only accepts the top 15 percent of applicants and still manages to pack over 100,000 students into its nine campuses.

Don't eat the green ones. They're not ripe yet.

Armed band of fools is symbolically executing women

Ah. Spring has finally slapped the make on Amherst. Twelve-year-old skateboarders are once again endangering lives by the Fine Arts Center. The pond duckies are being brought back from their winter state of semi-starvation. Vegetarians everywhere have dusted off their leather sandals. And that familiar anarchy of student common sense is underway.

All of us experience this to some degree. Afternoon class amnesia sends you scuttling to a grassy knoll clutching the latest issue of People magazine. Everyone seems wonderfully attractive, and the Close Up commercials playing in a continuous mental loop thwart any attempts at serious studying. This sweet idiocy of skipped classes and surging hormone levels is detrimental only to grade point averages, and is relatively harmless.

Yet some people insist on bypassing this innocent, temporary state of spring fever, and instead become infected with a raging case of Spring Rabies. This condition is characterized by a frenzied disregard for everyone in sight. A mad grin plastered upon their sunburnt faces, those suffering from spring rabies will do anything for attention. They are the tank-topped brainchildren who drive around campus aimlessly in what is more of a speaker on wheels than a car. Look at me! It's spring! Look at me! I'm happy!

I met some of these wonderkind personally on Sunday afternoon, but this time, they were armed. I was jogging down University Drive when I noticed a car full of collegiate men slowing as it approached. Assuming that they wanted to ask me the location of the nearest Taco Bell, I stopped running and waited. How nice of me. Within seconds, the passenger whipped out a neon green and yellow submachine squirt gun and blasted me right in the face. They then sped away cackling and hi-fiving the same way that lobotomized chimpanzees do when they think they've pulled a good one.

Lori
O'CONNOR

Honestly, I may have accompanied my heartfelt departing hand gesture towards them with a wry smile if it hadn't been for one thing; they shot one of my contact lenses straight into Never Never Land.

Delightful. While they were back at some dining commons playing table hockey with their tater tots and making anatomically correct mashed potato figurines, I was lurching back to my apartment like a homing pigeon on a bad acid trip. With one contact in, spacial relations become a nightmare. During my arduous journey up Main Street, I wondered about the junior high mentality I'd just encountered. I decided that they had chosen a neon squirt gun for two reasons:

1) To be sure that no one mistook them for members of the dread UMass mafioso

2) Like drooling babies and Cocker Spaniel puppies, tank-topped brain children are excited by bright, shiny objects.

Since that day, I've talked to several women who were victimized by the same men. Same car. Same squirt gun. Same baseball caps cutting short oxygen to the brain. From a feminist perspective, this whole scenario is outrageous. Go out alone, assert yourself as a strong, brave woman, and be symbollically executed.

Women of Amherst, beware. This marauding band of fools with a fluorescent firearm take no prisoners. If you find yourself hankering for a bit of solitary exercise, take precautions. Wear a raincoat. Keep your eyes clenched shut. Carry paintbombs.

Hmmm. Think about it: a group of men speeding around in a big car and squirting lone females with a big water pistol. It positively reeks of Freud. Come on guys, grow up. There's always 1-900 naughty numbers or the Advocate Entre Nous section. A cure for those crazy spring rabies is just a touch tone away.

And just imagine all the gas you'll save.

Learning from El Salvador

For 12 years, the Reagan and Bush Administrations did everything they could think of to prop up the government of El Salvador. All told, they poured $6 billion (far more if you adjust for inflation) of U.S. taxpayers' money into the hands of the Salvadoran military.

In 1981, when four U.S. nuns were murdered in cold blood by paramilitary death squads, the Reagan Administration assured Congress that the military had nothing to do with it. Then-Secretary of State Al Haig had the gall to accuse the nuns of possessing automatic weapons and running a roadblock, a claim that was entirely fabricated.

Jonah
GELBACH

A year later, when as many as 700 Salvadoran peasants were slaughtered by the army and buried in mass graves, Elliott Abrams, then assistant secretary of state for inter-American affairs (now a convicted, but pardoned, liar for Iran-Contra) assured Congress that no such massacre had occurred. He had evidence from the U.S. ambassador and two U.S. journalists that it had in fact happened.

In 1989, at the height of the rebel attack on San Salvador, the nation's capital, officers at the highest level of the Salvadoran military planned and ordered the murder of six Jesuit priests they viewed as being intellectual supporters of the rebels. One of the officers, Gen. Ponce, who went on to become minister of defense, ordered that no witnesses be left alive; this order led to the murder of the Jesuits' housekeeper and her daughter.

The military and its backers in the Bush Administration initially claimed that the rebels had killed the Jesuits. After it became clear that the murderers had actually been part of a crack Salvadoran batallion trained by U.S. "advisers," a tip-of-the-iceberg investigation ended with the convictions of two minor players in the murders.

We know many details of these and other human rights violations by the Salvadoran government, thanks to the recent report of the Truth Commission, which was set up as part of the treaty ending the civil war to chronicle rights abuses by both sides.

It appears that Abrams consistently, knowingly and willingly lied to Congress about the Salvadoran government's involvement in countless atrocities. He is joined in this distinction by former U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations and prominent closet fascist Jeanne Kirkpatrick. Whether they and other U.S. officials will be tried for perjury and other related crimes will depend on the depth of the Clinton Administration's investigation into their actions.

In the meantime, the right wing dominated Salvadoran Congress rushed general amnesty legislation to the desk of fellow extreme rightist President Cristiani immediately following the release of the Truth Commission's report. The law bars prosecution of top players in the military's murder machine, as well as giving immunity to the rebel leader who ordered the killings of a number of Salvadoran mayors.

In a more ironic twist of the amnesty, the two officers convicted in the Jesuits' killing will be released from prison and pardoned, while several rebels jailed for killing U.S. "advisers" who helped train those same officers will remain imprisoned. It seems the murder of clergy is legitimate conduct in war, while killing integral members of an army's war effort is something entirely different.

What we should learn from the tragedy of U.S. involvement in El Salvador is that covert action must be curtailed, and that public scrutiny of governments we finance is essential. Otherwise, we can only expect our taxes to fund more murders, massacres and torture.

Escape from the 'temple of doom'

I, along with half of this campus, encounter a somewhat life-threatening feat about twice a day. I enter the "temple of doom" (a.k.a. the dining commons).

This has to be the single worst experience one has to go through just to eat. Until last night I used to feel sorry for the people that actually work there.

As I entered, almost excited for "steak night," the card lady wasn't even there (no big deal). Then I proceeded to get the fattiest and toughest piece of meat along with a scoop of dry, grainy potatoes that came from a box.

Then the agony of actually getting a glass with ice was upon me. Once again, no clean glasses and no ice to fill the six paper cups I am now forced to use.

Finally I attempt to finish this vicious cycle and go for the silverware. Not only are there no forks but we are also napkinless.

About five minutes later the girl comes with the distorted silverware form hell, and proceeds to send the airborn forks into the pail making the loudest noise possible.

Now, more angry then words can possibly describe, I sit and try to cut my steak. I find it's impossible, and there are now permanent dents in my fingers caused by the extreme force I had to exert, for I was only given a butter knife.

And this was only one night. This is nothing new. My self being a freshman, I feel sorry for those who have endured this habitual hell for as long as they have, and I must commend them. . . those of you who haven't died, who haven't cried, or haven't spent a ludicrous amount of time in the room with a view (Wheeler jive for the bathroom), you deserve a medal.

I haven't gone through the efforts of actually figuring out how much money we spend on the meal plan, but I can guarantee it's not worth it.

I just don't understand what we did to deserve this "mystery meat" with gravy (which, by the way, is always gooped on top of the meat to hide the actual taste. . . see any horses lately?).

There would be nothing more pleasing than to have a nice dinner in a peaceful ambiance and actually eating something edible after a long day trudging through the mud.

Seeking the full truth about Tara

I hate to use the term "victim" when referring to Tara Hartnett because it minimizes her — it fails to express the 21 years of life and love and joy which we shared. Yes, Tara was a victim of her murderer, but she was also so much more than that.

I cannot reverse time to shield Tara from that final violence against her physical being, but I find that I can no longer remain mute against the continued violence being inflicted upon Tara, her daughter, and upon all of us who love them both.

I have recently acquired and read copies of articles published in the media which give a distorted view of Tara's relationships with her daughter and with James Cyr.

I had ample opportunity to witness the interaction between Tara and Meghan. I saw the light in her eyes as she gently sang and rocked her baby to sleep. I watched Tara crawl around my living room floor with Meghan. I witnessed her joy as Meghan reached for her and called her "mama." I felt her anguish when she was forcefully separated from and denied access to her own daughter.

Someone was quoted as saying that Cyr was both mother and father to Meghan. This individual knows not of what she speaks. It is frighteningly cruel to me that anyone would seek to perpetuate Cyr's obsessive desire to deny Meghan her mother's love.

Someone else has volunteered that Cyr first issued a restraining order against Tara. The glaring omission from this statement is that Cyr did not perceive Tara as a physical threat to him — he just wanted to keep her from her baby. Tara's restraining order against Cyr was accompanied by a doctor's report of injury, and an assault and battery complaint.

In closing, to those of you who loudly ask that we allow a jury to determine Cyr's guilt, I quietly ask that you too seek the full truth, no matter where it may take you.

And so UMass searches

As I endure here on the 7th floor balcony of Grayson, reflecting upon life and gazing at the bowl, an overwhelming force inches me closer to the edge. Seemingly, it wants to push me over into an abyss of lost hope, a black hole of reason, a pit of dark despair. . .

Recently, Housing Services, a well known breeding ground of administrative hardship, held a campus-wide search for next year's resident assistants. Seeking only the best and brightest for this highly visible position of leadership, supervision and responsibility, they turned down many of the applicants.

Steven L.
COHEN

In fact, so many were disqualified or rejected due to inadequate ability and experience that many of the housing clusters are currently left with unfilled rosters for next year's staff. That's right, they are going to have to reopen the RA search, in one form or another, because the mass of the original applicant pool just wasn't competent enough to cut it.

Balanced on tiptoes, hands reaching for the heavens, connected to this world only by the balcony rail on which I perch, I resist. The pale blue silhouette of the stranger in my soul glows with the steel-gray of the sinking sun in the east.

The force converges on the upper left of my back, as if to force my heart from me. Aloft, I cry out the silence of a lonely victim. My body arches; instinctively it assumes the position. The apex of my force reached, I. . .

The end of my first year of college will also bring to a close the term of Chancellor-ad-nominal Richard O'Brien. A search committee is vigorously involved in a nationwide search to fill this highly visible position of leadership, supervision and leadership. They chose four candidates to display before the student body and faculty as the best and brightest of the applicant pool.

After all four spoke, the Student Government Association, the elected voice of over 16,000 undergraduates, overwhelmingly voted to formally request that the search be reopened due to the mediocrity and inexperience of the finalists.

Ignoring this plea from students who have been overpaying for underworking administration-over-easy for too long, the committee forwarded two names, Caudia Mitchell-Kernan and David Scott, to University President Michael Hooker, who will make the final decision. This is typical of the lack of respect that the administration fosters as its policy toward the students who pay their salaries.

. . . Freeze frame. Breaking the tension surface of the black, or is it white, nothing below me, I wonder why this force is moving me so much. Originally it approached me, promisingly, as the wind beneath my wings; now I surge submissively into an ocean of questioning, to imminently drown in doubt.

I pass no judgements on the two candidates; one of them will be chosen and may be qualified. I realize that the RA situation is not exactly parallel to the chancellor search, but there is a principle here that grossly insults my moral fibers. I was going to protest by burning the words "hope" and "new chancellor" on the Student Union steps, but you know what they say about things that fit on the S.U. steps. . .

Burning in an intense void of unknown, the bright blinding darkness burns into the pores of my mind like leprosy. Won't someone catch me, please. . .

■ spring

"The flower colors will vary from white to a dark, almost lavender color; there are tons of rhododendrons growing north of the campus pond. . . right next to the Student Union."

The forsythia is another frequent find, blooming with small yellow flowers. It can be found in the smaller gardens on the grounds of the Durfee Conservatory. Probably the most common flower on campus is the daffodil. Professor Jack O'Hearn of the Stockbridge School recalled the planting project in the fall of 1988 that established the flower's enormous population.

"A few years ago, we planted 100,000 (daffodil) bulbs on the grounds. There were six different types," he said. "We may have about half a million by now," O'Hearn said. "You may see them all over campus; they're in full bloom right now."

All of the blooming flowers come from buds pre-formed the previous fall.

O'Hearn wants the campus community to know about the arboretum and its important scientific and aesthetic contribution to the University.

"We appreciate that we have such a large and diverse collection of plants on the campus," he said.

Because of the long, harsh winter, this spring's bloom is happening much more gradually than in the past.

"Around here, if you have a hard winter, these buds aren't very hardy," said Mulgrew.

A particularly beautiful tree, the Saucer Magnolia, is found outside of Fernald Hall, near the Franklin Dining Commons. It is currently in bloom and will peak at the end of this week.

pants and asked them to halt their activity.

After a few moments of silence, Lehane said, "It's just not appropriate on this campus. If we let you do this, we'd have to let all groups do it." Lehane, who refused to identify himself at the time, then quickly retreated from a Collegian photographer.

Minutes later, Lehane returned in a University vehicle with a security advisor who confiscated students identification cards and driver's licenses until the University police arrived.

Neither the security officer, nor the Department of Public Safety would release the advisor's name.

As three University police officers arrived, a verbal confrontation ensued.

"What you're doing is inappropriate. This could be offensive to some people," Sgt. Mark T. Labranche of the UMass police told the group.

"Anything written by anybody could be offensive to somebody," Labranche added.

Participants argued they had the right to utilize state property to exercise their freedom of expression without permanently defacing the Student Union.

"Chalk is not going to hurt any one," Woolwich said, as another student added "The KKK has the right to speak. I should have the right to speak."

Labranche expressed concern over who would wash away the potentially offensive chalkings. "If it doesn't rain in the next couple of days, someone is going to have to come out here and wash it off," Labranche said. "Why don't you just pass out leaflets to people walking by?" he asked.

"We can't be here 24 hours a day, but a message that washes away eventually can," Woolwich asserted.

"How would you feel if a heterosexual male wrote that all women should be raped?" Labranche asked the participants who counter that their slogans promoted acceptance, not violence.

Singling out a chalked phrase that stated, "Lick me, I'm a Dyke," Labranche told the chalkers that many people would be offended by it.

"What about the Fort Lauderdale heterosexual boys 'show us your tits'? It's in our face. I don't get it. We're being as radical as they are," one of the chalkers said.

When asked, a woman police officer who had been quiet during the confrontation called the chalkings "freedom of expression."

Student reaction to the incident had been mixed. One male student, walking by the chalkers Tuesday night, loudly proclaimed his heterosexuality.

The student yelled, "this is reverse racism," and added, "I'm heterosexual and it's OK." All the participants were White.

In response to Tuesday night's chalking, another chalking appeared yesterday morning which said "To the LBGA and Allys. Please do not deface UMass. From the Jerky Brothers."

Other students supported the GLB community's effort.

Sitting on the Student Union steps yesterday morning amidst remnants of chalk, undergraduate Julie Benbeneck questioned why the chalkings had to be destroyed.

"Give me a break. Why are people afraid of something written on the sidewalk? Is it actually going to make them think? It's fear. That's what it is," Benbeneck said.

"For too long, too many decades, we've accepted bigots' uncomfortability with our lives and our loving each other and it's time for the invisibility and the intolerance to stop," Woolwich concluded.

Court battle begins for papers of civil rights leader King Jr.

By DANIEL BEEGAN
Associated Press

BOSTON — The emotion-laden trial over ownership of a large portion of personal papers of slain civil rights leader Martin Luther King opened Wednesday in a Massachusetts court.

King's widow, Coretta Scott King, sued Boston University in Suffolk County Superior Court, asking that papers King deposited with BU in 1964 and 1965 be returned so she could put them at the Martin Luther King Jr. Center for Nonviolent Social Change in Atlanta.

But Lawrence Elswit, a lawyer for Boston University, said King donated the papers to the university where he received his doctor of philosophy degree in 1955 and never changed his mind.

It was Mrs. King, not the Rev. Dr. King, who has sought the return of the papers, he said.

The trial is expected to last as long as three weeks with Mrs. King, King's son and close advisers and BU President John Silber expected to testify.

Both sides acknowledge King signed a letter on July 16, 1964, naming the BU library as the repository of his papers and saying he intended to give some of them each year as an outright gift to the university.

"In the event of my death, all such materials deposited with the university shall become from that date the absolute property of Boston University," the letter said.

King was fatally shot in 1968 and died without a will.

But Rudolph Pierce, chief attorney for Mrs. King, said King wanted his papers at a black college, but none in Atlanta had the facilities in 1964 to care for them while BU was building a new library.

Pierce said King feared for the safety of the papers because of threats against him and firebombings in the south.

But Pierce said, "In 1968, with the encouragement of his wife, Dr. King changed his mind."

Pierce said in 1967 King and his wife set up a committee that included friends, advisers and King's father to decide on a permanent home for his papers.

"Dr. Martin Luther King changed his mind and BU was well aware of it," Pierce said in opening arguments to the jury. "He wanted his papers returned to the South."

But Elswit said King never personally asked for the papers to be returned and BU never offered to give them back.

"Dr. King never told anyone at Boston University . . . that he changed his mind," Elswit said.

The plan

Robinson's plan to reorganize the trust fund would reduce the student activities fee by $33 and raise the curriculum by the same amount to absorb the cost of the Student Activities Office its workers' salaries.

The rest of the student activities fee, totalling $84 after a $4.50 increase for fiscal year 1994, will remain in the trust fund to support student programs, agencies and businesses.

The trust fund commonly supports events such as Asian Night, Lesbian Gay Bisexual Alliance dances, the annual Ski Sale, lectures for the Distinguished Visitor's Program and the Spring Concert, as well as providing regular funding for student organizations.

Financial freedom

Student organizations will benefit financially by having full use of the trust fund, said Robinson. This way the trust fund will not be tapped by the SAO to absorb rising operational costs, as had been the case in the past, Robinson said.

"The dollars students paid into the trust fund that were being used for student activities were declining and dollars for support staff were increasing," Robinson said.

The situation grew worse recently after the state legislature mandated a 13 percent increase for 50,000 unionized state employees, including SAO employees, to be implemented in fiscal year 1993-94.

A motion to increase the student activities fee to help pay raise was met with animosity in the Student Senate, said Nathan Guerrero, chair of the Senate's budget committee.

"The feeling was 'Why should we pay a fee increase if it's being used to pay professional employees?'" Guerrero said.

"The purpose was to change funding for employees of the SAO from student-funded to state-funded," said Student Trustee Kevin Newnan said. Newnan said that with Robinson's proposed changes, future pay increases for SAO workers will be footed by the state.

"The SAO has maintained has maintained a parasitic relationship on our trust fund. It focused more on the Student Activities Office and not on student activities, per se," Newnan said.

Newnan praised Robinson's reorganizaton, saying it will result in greater financial control for student organizations.

Crew club off to tremendous start this season

By CATHERINE B. PULLEY
Collegian Correspondent

In the sport of crew, it is a tradition for the winning boat to throw its coxswain into the water as a celebration of victory.

The coxswains for the University of Massachusetts crew team, especially Jen Bragg and Jessica Fountas, have been meeting the water a lot lately thanks to the success of the men's varsity lightweight boat and the women's varsity heavyweight boat, which is undefeated so far this season.

The varsity heavyweight men were also undefeated, beating such schools as Harvard, Boston College, Trinity, and Holy Cross, until a disappointing loss to Coast Guard this weekend by a length.

"The loss will actually increase their confidence," said coach Gregg Siemenkowski, who is the first year UMass coach. He brings with him experience as an assistant varsity coach at Harvard and an Olympic Training Camp coach as well as having worked with eastern sprint schools.

"Our coach has an incredible authority on and off the water," says Rob Melionek, President-Elect of the UMass Crew Club, and member of the varsity lightweight boat.

The men's varsity heavyweight brings with it a wealth of experience, with all of the rowers returning, plus Thor Runeman, a new varsity stroke who came up from novices last year. Runeman, along with Brian Chewitt, trained in an Olympic Development camp where he was coached by Siemenkowski.

The women's heavyweight boat is also rich in experience, and can add to their record a first time victory against Navy, the national champion last year. They also defeated Boston College, Mount Holyoke, Worchester Polytechnical Institute and Trinity. They boast a boat with four Olympic Development trainees.

The men's varsity lightweight boat is also undefeated, with victories against the University of New Hampshire, Coast Guard, Williams, Trinity and the Harvard freshman lightweight crew.

"We're the fastest crew in New England," said Steve Casco, a member of the lightweight boat.

There is more to crew than just waking up in the morning and pulling an oar, according to Heather Witalisz, the stroke for the women's team, who described it as "the toughest sport both physically and mentally."

UMass crew is in a position to place in the top three at New Englands, and place high at Nationals.

University of Hartford (12-18) for a 3 p.m. battle.

The Hawks had better luck against UConn earlier this season 8-6 by pounding out 15 hits in the victory. Mike Morhardt picked up the win for Hartford.

Diamond Notes: Outfielder Justin Howard is not only at the top of the UMass batting charts but the nation's as well. Howard is eighth in the country with a .452 average. The junior continued his hot hitting in the contest with UConn going 2 for 4.

Ace starter Jeff Toothaker came out of the bullpen in yesterday's game, giving up zeroes across the board in 1.2 IP.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Events move swiftly today. Reserve the evening for rest and reflection. Confine work to office hours and spend more time with your loved ones. A phone call brings welcome financial news.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Today's oversights or delays may cause you to throw up your hands in dismay. If you do not like what you see happening, remove yourself from the scene. Your ESP is often right.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): A day to listen, learn and clearly spell out important directives. Be on time for appointments and meetings. You are about to gain new prominence.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Budgetary matters merit your prompt attention. Someone influential is impressed by practicality, not lavish display. You rediscover you are needed by people who truly treasure you.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): You are now in a better position to solidify your business and financial plans. Turn to professionals for advice on a matter that confuses you. A relationship is strengthened by considerate gestures.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Issue an ultimatum if there is no alternative. Others should not be spending your money. Traveling may be as frustrating as it is enlightening. Ride with the tide.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): An idea that will earn you extra money comes from out of the blue. Recruit others to help you devise a workable plan. Higher-ups could be available. Chalk it up to work pressures.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Take a neighbor's financial tips with a grain of salt. Family tensions increase if you are too opinionated. Summer brings travel plans of a French-speaking city. It's sure to be an interesting trip.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): An influential person comes to you with an unusual offer. There could be strings attached. Accept a spur-of-the-moment invitation for the evening. Dress fashionably.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Solve a knotty problem by consulting experts. If higher-ups ask pointed questions, be candid but do not betray your sources. Salespeople have tremendous luck today.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): All the signs point to rising hopes. Club doings prove stimulating with intellectual people. Singles could meet a potential spouse. Be careful not to come on too strong!

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Give whatever you are doing all you have. An enthusiastic associate will pave the way to success. The emphasis tonight is on combining business with pleasure. You shine as a host.

Zoo Disc finds sweet success in New York

By DAVID GLEESON
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts ultimate frisbee team, Zoo Disc, made an excellent showing of its teamwork and force as a New England team this past weekend at a small tournament in New Paltz, N.Y.

The tournament was held at State University of New York, on a rain drenched field. The mud did not stop Zoo Disc however. They played with skill and confidence running through the competition, and making the finals. Although they lost the championship final to club team Beernuts, the tournament was a success for the intense Zoo Disc team.

The team opened up the tournament against Connecticut College and dominated every aspect of the game, controlling their opponent with precise passing, and intimidating defense. Zoo Disc ran the score to 8-1 at the half and finished with a final of 15-2. The game ended with Zoo Disc forcing a turnover setting up a pass into the endzone to T. Christian Zimirowski, ending the game at 15.

While many aspects of the game and tournament were important according to team leader Tim O'Leary, "The most important was definitely our patience." This patience was very apparent in their passing, excellent handling, and was the key to their victories.

Zoo Disc's next game, against Central Park Ultimate gave UMass another victory, but proved to be costly. The muddy conditions of this particular contest helped the Zoo Disc team which is accustomed to wet conditions, but at the same time took a lot of the stamina out of it. The contest lasted three hours, with Zoo Disc running the score to 14-9 before CPU made a small rally to 14-13. Zoo Disc controlled most of the game with spectacular defense, particularly by Phil Muller, who ended the contest by receiving a pass from another key player, Jamie Mathey.

With this win, Zoo Disc entered the final contest against Beernuts, who had three hours of rest before the championship, while the UMass squad was playing trying to gain its way into the final. Despite being tired, Zoo Disc managed to keep up with Beernuts during the beginning of the contest and it looked like it was going to make a run.

However, Beernuts gained the momentum on its seventh goal, making it 8-7. Things abruptly turned around and the long day took it's toll on Zoo Disc as it could no longer run with the rested and speedy opponent. Beernuts quickly ran the game out to 15-7 before Zoo Disc could manage another score.

yesterday. Overall, I am very pleased with this team's season", said LaFreniere.

The Penn Relays are broken into championship and college divisions. Hart (discus) and Ozzolek (hammer) have qualified for the championship division, which features the top ten athletes in the nation.

The 4x800m relay team featuring Aker, Becky and Lennice Johnson, and Liljeblad will also be in the top division. Meeks will compete in the triple jump in the college section.

After Penn the team will head to the Dartmouth Invitational on Sunday. The Minutewomen then hope to compete in the season ending New England Championships and the ECAC's in Fairfax, Virginia. Meeks, Hart, and Ozzolek have qualified for the prestigious event.

The Provost of the University of Massachusetts, Dr. Glen Gordon, and the Phi Kappa Phi Chapter of this University are proud to announce the following list of new members invited from the Junior and Senior classes as well as the Graduate School and Faculty, and approved by the Chapter in accordance with the bylaws of the National Society.

Phi Kappa Phi was originally founded in 1897 at the University of Maine and was subsequently named the Morrill Society, in honor of the sponsor of the Congressional Act which provided for land-grant colleges and universities. In 1900 it was transformed into a national society by the Presidents of the University of Maine, the University of Tennessee, and Pennsylvania State University. The next chapter to join was the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, which remains the fourth-oldest chapter in the United States. The Society was renamed Phi Kappa Phi in 1900, from the initial letters of the Greek words forming its adopted motto: Philosophia Krateito Photon, "Let the love of learning rule mankind."

To be eligible for membership, Juniors must have a GPA of 3.85 and Seniors a CPA of 3.7. Only two Graduate students per program are nominated by their Graduate Directors. In addition, two faculty are chosen for membership each year based on recommendations from their respective Deans.

The Phi Kappa Phi Initiation Ceremony will be held in the University Rhododendron Garden, below the Chancellor's Residence, at 11:00 PM on Sunday, May 16, 1993. Initiates are invited to bring family members or friends.

to cover everything as in-depth as possible, but, of course, people complain. To use a Collegian cliche, I'm still learning. Yeah, right.

On To The Hoop

The NBA Playoffs are less than one week away, and I'm saddened to report that the New Jersey Nets will be in the big show. My last three columns have forgotten about the Nets, while focusing on such faves as the Celtics and the Knicks. But Chuck Daly's bunch probably would have been better off in the lottery, getting a shot at either Anfernee Hardaway, George Lynch or Calbert Cheaney.

Well, maybe not. I thought they would just give up, let the rest of the teams in the East pass them, and gather up the ping-pong balls. But no. The Nets have pride.

Chicago Bulls, 60607.

Producer Aaron Spelling and his writers came up with the idea that a character would hit a shot from half court at a Lakers game. If he made it, he would win $10,000.

Coca-Cola and Lettuce Entertain You, a restaurant chain in the Chicago area, came up with the idea that some lucky fan would get the chance to shoot from the foul line to the opposite hoop for $1 million.

Steve Sanders hit the shot, made a cool G, and left the Forum with for him, pocket change. Don Calhoun went to Chicago Stadium to enjoy a free Bulls game, and left a millionaire.

Coincidence? I think not.

Best of Buddies: Bill Walton and Chris Webber.

After NBA *Outs*ider Bill Walton decided that Michigan was "a bunch of underachievers," the brainiacs who decided to put Walton and Chris Webber on the same table at the Wooden awards banquet blew it. You can't expect Webber to even speak to that goof. He has pride.

Did you see that?

• Tammy Marshall winning the first national championship for this school since . . . Tammy Marshall, when she won last year.

• Cooooool Colt 45. Swill this 40 oz. and there is no need for mouthwash before a party.

Gorillas overcome Crimson with 13-8 win

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

MATT KAHN / COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Mike Valente and the University of Massachusetts lacrosse team defeated Harvard 13-8 yesterday. The Gorillas come home to Garber Field to play Rutgers Saturday at 1 p.m.

Cambridge, Mass. — The last two years, the Harvard men's lacrosse team has played the University of Massachusetts very close, only to lose both games in overtime. Going into yesterday's game at Ohiri field, UMass had to be wondering if the same type of game was in its fate.

Fortunately for the Gorillas, fate went a little easier on them in 1993, as they fought and clawed their way to a 13-8 victory, thanks to five goals by Wes Depp and some clutch saves by goalie Tom LoPresti. The win ups 10th ranked UMass' record to 7-2 and drops Harvard to 1-7.

"We won the game but we can't be satisfied with a four or five goal advantage," said coach Ted Garber, referring to the team's sloppy play at the end of the game. "When we played well out there, we were patient, we didn't force anything and we got the ball to the open man."

In the early going the Crimson were tough, gaining a 3-2 edge at the end of one quarter, thanks to two goals during the stretch by attackman Mike Porter. But the Gorillas fought back, scoring six goals in the second frame, two during a crucial man-up on a Harvard illegal stick penalty. LoPresti was a wall during the period, not allowing any goals.

The prettiest goal of the game came when Mark Millon (three goals) scooped up a ground ball with one hand, streaked around the Harvard defender and passed over to Eric Bailey (two goals) who faked the goalie right and fired into the left corner. From this point, UMass never relinquished the lead.

"They were a 1-6 team going into the game but they've played a lot of [top 25] teams tough," said Depp, who also had an assist to go along with his five goals. "But we knew if we got a big lead and kept playing hard, we'd have a good chance to win."

Harvard came out of the blocks in the third ready to play, scoring a goal 3:20 into the second half when Dan Nicklas took a pass from teammate Ed Sim and made no mistake about it. But UMass' Chris Nentwich increased the Gorilla lead back up to five when he took a feed from Depp, faked left and fired home a sidearm shot into the top-left corner.

The fourth quarter was chippy, to say the least, with UMass and Harvard committing a number of penalties. It seemed as though the Gorillas were letting the Crimson back in the games at times, but the Big Red could get no closer than 13-8.

"We lost our heads a little at the end," said UMass middie Bill Edell. "They're a tough team — luckily we were able to pull out a win."

Also adding goals for the Gorillas were Greg Kline and Ken Ward, who also added an assist. Ken Rendazzo also added one assist.

The UMass win seemed to have a demoralizing effect on the Crimson players.

"We played physically out there today and played solidly, except for one lull in the second quarter," said a dejected Robb Hirsch. "Our problem is we weren't able to finish today.

"But you have to give UMass credit — they're a good, all-around team."

Lax Notes: The Gorillas will begin a three-game homestand this Saturday, when they face off against Rutgers at 1 p.m.

UMass, UConn to collide again

By SEAN P. HAYDEN
Collegian Staff

Big.

That's the only word capable of describing today's matchup between the University of Massachusetts softball team and its long-time rival, the University of Connecticut.

How else could you describe a game between the No. 2 and 3 ranked teams in the Northeast region, a game that pits two teams against each other that are currently riding six-game winning streaks, and a game between the two biggest rivals in New England?

"I think the games will be extremely intense and very, very competitive," says UMass head coach Elaine Sortino. "Both teams are capable of exploding."

Indeed both teams are capable of exploding. In their last six games, the Minutewomen have outscored their opponents 47-3 while the Huskies have bested their last six victims by a 54-2 margin. Both teams have banged out an identical 75 hits in that span.

Leading the attack against the UConn pitching corps will be senior catcher Sherri Kuchinskas, who not only broke the UMass all-time home run record on Tuesday, but also picked up her second A-10 Player of the Week award in as many weeks.

Kuchinskas leads UMass in all major offensive categories, except runs scored. Entering today's game, the co-captain is batting .461 with 35 hits, 10 doubles, 16 runs scored, four home runs, and 24 runs batted in.

Center fielder Heather Dorsey (.338), left fielder Stacey Nichols (.330 with 10 RBI and 28 runs scored), shortstop Jennifer Raworth (.328), and first baseman Rachel Lawson (.309 and 15 RBI) have also been major contributors to the recent UMass offensive outburst.

Offense alone does not win games, however, and Sortino is well aware of that.

"Defensively, we're a much stronger team than two weeks ago," Sortino said. "Our pitchers have turned in some great performances and they'll be coming off a couple of days rest, so that will be good."

Two weeks ago, the Minutewomen dropped a doubleheader to this same Husky squad by a 4-0 and 2-0 count, but that is ancient history according to Sortino.

"We're looking to it," Sortino said. "And we're looking to get done what we need to get done — a couple of wins."

Baseball falls short in ninth against UConn 7-6

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

A late ninth inning rally by the University of Massachusetts baseball team fell short yesterday in Storrs, Conn., as the Minutemen dropped a 7-6 decision to the University of Connecticut.

The Minutemen (9-16) were looking to win their second straight over a Connecticut opponent after drubbing Central Connecticut University 32-11 on Tuesday. But the Huskies had other ideas, and handed UMass a loss for the second time this season. The earlier contest was a 12-2 blowout at Earl Lorden Field on April 7 in which the Minutemen could find no offense.

After only mustering three runs in the first six innings against UConn starter and eventual winner Aaron Quinn, the Minutemen touched up reliever John Kelly for one run on two hits in the eighth inning. Kelly took over for Quinn in the seventh, but didn't face trouble until the eighth.

UConn closer Kevin Strollo, who pitched the ninth, was greeted with the same tenacity by the Minutemen that Kelly faced.

UMass was able to scratch out two runs on two hits in the ninth, before Strollo shut the door on the Minutemen by getting clean-up hitter first baseman Bill Knight to pop out, preserving the UConn victory and picking up the save in the process.

Rich Johnson started the game for UMass and picked up the loss, allowing six runs on eight hits in three and two thirds innings of action.

The offense was able to tally 13 hits against the Huskies, with the bottom of the order having the most success. Center fielder Nelson Ubaldo (3 for 4, one run scored), catcher Andy Pelis (2 for 4, two runs batted in), and left fielder Justin Kelly (2 for 3, 2 RBI, one run scored) did most of the damage for UMass on the day.

The Minutemen stay in the Constitution State today as they travel to the Front page, gymnastics and hype

Hey, this is another edition of Notes from the Hardwood. That's right, Notes from the Hardwood.

NOTES FROM THE HARDWOOD by Art Stapleton

But before I hit the courts, I have decided to use my space for something other than basketball. While some of you are saying that I do this every week, read, grin and bear it.

For the readers of this column, you probably know that I have covered women's gymnastics for the past . . . oh, I don't know, say three and a half months. I take pride in the sports that I cover, if you can't tell.

Friends of mine can attest to the fact that I would have gymnastics at the top of the page every day. Actually, if you really know me, you'd say I would put the Minutewomen on the front page of the Collegian. This is how important I think this or any other sports team is.

However, in this world called UMass, sufficient has different meanings for different people. I try

Hart sets two school records for women's track

By ANTHONY GUIDO
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's track and field team has completed its dual meet season with a perfect 4-0 record. The Minutewomen trounced the University of Vermont and Springfield College in their last dual meet.

UMass finished with 75.5 points, Vermont had 67, and Springfield College had 38.5.

UMass' Natalie Hart set two school records. She set the discus record winning the event at 152'2" and the shot put record at 43'0", remarkably not enough to win the event, losing to Jen Isham of Vermont by half an inch.

Janey Meeks easily won the triple jump at 39'0" with almost a three foot margin of victory. UMass placed one-two in the long jump with Meeks edging Sherry Booker, 16'5" to 16'0".

Booker went on to win the 100 meters and 200 meters, nipping Jess Lovejoy of Springfield in both races. Diane Ozzolek finished second in the hammer throw and third in the discus.

Lennice Johnson won the 400m with a time of 58.6 seconds as well as the 400m hurdles, with a time of 66.1 seconds. She combined with Booker, Becky Johnson, and Kerry Aker to win the 4x400m relay in 4:01.1 over Springfield by eight seconds.

Becky Johnson won the 1500m at 4:38.6, with teammate Kelly Liljeblad taking second. Becky Johnson and Aker placed second and third in the 800m.

In the 3000m, UMass finished second and third as Liljeblad and Julie Moreau ran strong races. The Minutewoman had strong showings in nearly every event.

Now the best athletes on the team look forward to the Penn Relays tomorrow through Saturday. Head coach Julie LaFreniere said she believes her team is ready.

"The team looked good, we had a high quality workout
